Citation unveiled tomorrow

The company bills it as the first Chevy of the '80s, and it could well be the shape of cars of the next decade.

The Chevrolet Citation is smaller, lighter and more fuel-efficient than the car it replaces.

The Citation, to be unveiled at press conferences across the country tomorrow and to go on sale April 18, is the front wheel drive replacement for the Nova line. It is about 20 inches shorter and 800 pounds lighter than the Nova.

But more importantly, the new car gets far better mileage than its forerunner. With the standard 4-cylinder engine (90 horsepower) and 4-speed transmission, the Citation gets 24 miles per gallon in the city and 38 on the highway, according to the Environmental Protection Agency. The 1979 Nova was rated at 19 city and 28 highway. The Citation's figures represent a 32 percent increase over Nova's.

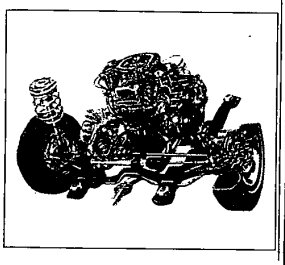
A 115 horsepower V-6 engine is an option, as is an automatic transmission.

Chevrolet General Manager Robert Lund said the new car has, "the exterior dimensions of a subcompact, the interior room of a mid-size can and as much luggage capacity as many full-size sedans."

The Citation will be available in three body styles — a two-door notchback, a two-door hatchback and a four-door hatchback. All the models have a 104.9 inch wheelbase.

The car has front disc brakes, rack and pinion steering and front MacPherson struts.

Chevrolet's newest goes on sale April 19



This cutaway view shows a power-train option on Chevy's Citation. The 2.8-liter V-6 engine is mounted transversely. The GM car is the first to have a V-6 mounted this way.
