
Rites of spring

The Jeep CJ-5 and CJ-7, which plowed through the winter storms, convert to open air "convertibles" when the weather warms and recreational activities lure people outdoors. The Jeep CJ soft-top models, with four-wheel-drive capabilities, are among the few soft-top cars still available — few now-extinct convertibles had roll bars.

If you don't use gas, you can save money

The best way to save gasoline is to not use it.

Tuning your engine helps. Keeping your tires properly inflated helps. Driving a small car helps. Driving sensibly helps.

But if you don't drive those miles, you won't be using gasoline. And you will be saving money.

Planning and consolidating trips is akin to not driving because you are getting the maximum use from the miles you drive. Why drive to two grocery stores to save 40 cents if you will burn 40 cents in gasoline? In some compact cars, a mile costs seven cents, just in gasoline.

To get an idea of what it costs to drive a mile, divide the current cost of the type of gasoline you buy by the miles-per-gallon you are getting. Then round the cost up a penny.

This takes into account the poorer gas mileage for short trips, but totaly ignores the other costs such as wear on tires, car insurance and depreciation of the car. The government allows 18 cents per mile, taking into account these other expenses.

Is it cheaper to drive to the bank than to cash your check by mail? If you are getting 15 miles per gallon and your bank is more than one mile from your home or normal driving route, you are ahead banking by mail.

If you can save $1 on a pizza from a pizzeria seven miles from home, you are better off not "saving" that dollar.

Driving two miles to a utility office is an obvious way to waste gasoline — and money as well, assuming you get fewer than 38 miles per gallon.

In addition to saving gasoline, you can save a nice sum by selling an unused second (or third) car. Insurance costs a minimum of $2 a week in this area. You may be paying $7 a week or more for insurance on a car. Is having an additional car worth that constant drain on your wallet?
