'Reservoir' plots intense crime caper

JOHN MONAGHAN

They discuss the "real" meaning of Madonna's "Like a Virgin" and argue about tipping waitresses over cups of coffee in a cheap restaurant. They volley lewd adolescent insults and then roll around on the floor in fake fights.

They also carry guns, usually two or three at a time, and don't hesitate to use them in a jam. A botched jewelry store heist forces them to do just that, offing police, innocent bystanders, and eventually themselves in the process.

"Reservoir Dogs," a stylized new crime film at the Maple, spends a memorable two-hours with these small-time hoods.

Definitely not for all tastes (some 15 people walked out during the preview screening), this black comedy spills buckets of blood and mines the kind of intensity that made David Lynch's "Blue Velvet" such an instant classic.

Lawrence Tierney, a veteran of '40s film noir, has the build and demeanor of an aging wrestler. He plays Joe, who selects six supposedly trustworthy men for this routine heist. He insists that they use code names (Mr. Pink, Mr. White, Mr. Brown, etc.) in case they are caught.

And of course, they aren't satisfied with the monickers, especially nonconforming Mr. Pink (Steve Buscemi). "How about Mr. Purple?" he says. "I could agree to that."

"Reservoir Dogs" jumps back and forth from the aftermath to the planning while never showing the actual heist. Regrouping at an empty warehouse, the remaining colors figure that somebody squealed to the cops.

Writer/director Quentin Tarantino, who also plays Mr. Brown, has assembled a heavenly cast of character actors. Buscemi, a familiar face from "Mystery Train" and "Barton Fink," has a perfect wrong-place-at-the-wrong-time quality. He also gets some of the movie's best lines, from his litany about tipping to his frustrated
