Both stripper and 'Playboy' for kids are in poor taste

STREET SENSE

BARBARA SCHIFF

Voice Mail Message:
Barbara,

Here's one more comment on "Playboy" for kids. Couldn't the Mom who's 12-year-old son wants a subscription to this magazine find herself charged with a crime, if she gave in? Wouldn't providing pornography to a child be considered contributing to the delinquency of a minor, or as child sexual abuse?

The situation reminded me of the parents who were in the news last year for hiring a stripper for their 12-year-old's birthday party. I hope this Mom took your subtle advice and told the kid to forget it.

Dear Caller,

Before I answer your call, let me expand on the situation to which you refer. These parents hired an exotic dancer to entertain at their 12-year-old son's birthday party. They were arrested and charged with two counts of permitting the sexual abuse of a child. The party activities included allowing their son to lick whipped cream off the dancer's bikini clad breasts.

Besides being against the law, behavior like this is also unethical and immoral. These parents are trying to gratify their own needs. It would be enlightening to know how the boy felt about it.

In response to your question, I asked a prominent attorney knowledgable in this field. He said the answer is no, parents can not be charged with contributing to the delinquency of a minor, or with child sexual abuse for providing their son with a subscription to "Playboy." In this case the law is sensible, which is more than can be said for the parents who hired the stripper.

I do not agree with you that hiring a naked dancer for one's son and getting him a subscription to "Playboy" are equally poor parenting. Both, however, are in poor taste.

■ These parents are trying to gratify their own needs. It would be enlightening to know how the boy felt about it.

Commenting again on parents' intentions, the subscription buyers could have good intentions, albeit thwarted by poor judgment. In the case of the first parents, good intentions are hard to find.
