'Electric Motor City'

Detroit Edison is testing 16 electrically powered American-built Volkswagen Rabbits in Detroit. The utility hopes to promote the development and use of electric cars. Electric utilities would benefit because large-scale use of electric cars would even out the demand for electricity because electrically powered cars would be recharged at night, when the demand for electricity is lowest.

Idling engine can waste your expensive gasoline

"Idle" is defined by the dictionary as "lacking worth or basis, having no particular reason for existing or occurring, not occupied or employed or simply: trifling, lazy or slothful."

In the case of the automobile, those descriptive terms don't generally apply. Idling, of course, is essential in starting and operating your car.

But there are times when "idle" isn't doing your car or your wallet any favors. It's a drain and with gasoline more and more expensive, idling can be an extravagant waste.

Your miles per gallon at idle is zero.

EXCESSIVE TIME spent on warming up a cold engine by idling is an unnecessary exercise. And doing it after warm-up is even less desirable.

Your better bet is to drive at moderate speed during the warm-up time. It will produce better fuel economy than if you idle the engine until it reaches normal temperatures.

So, when you leave for work or that shopping trip tomorrow morning, don't waste your time or your gasoline by running the engine before you back out of your garage. Start up and go, but go at a moderate speed.

A pretty good rule of thumb is to turn off your engine if you are not going to move your car for 30 seconds or more. It's less expensive to cut the engine and restart it.

FOR INSTANCE, it pays to cut the engine when you drop a passenger off for a brief errand; or if you are at a railroad crossing, waiting for a long freight train to pass.

Should you move the lever to neutral on a car equipped with an automatic transmission — when you are stopped in heavy traffic? Generally, you probably would be just as well to leave the car in "drive" position because traffic tie-ups generally force stop and go driving.
