Schools Need Federal Aid Says Professor

Michigan's public schools need federal aid, says Howard R. Jones, professor of school administration at The University of Michigan.

"We must reach into the pocket where the money is, not on which is exhausted," he declares. "The federal government collects 80 per cent of all tax monies and we have been overlooking our greatest source of revenue."

He points out that the state's drastic need for more school buildings has been brought about by a population increase which has mounted steadily over the last 16 years.

"In this period of time we have more than doubled the number of births in Michigan. We're adding about 70,000 school children a year. By this time, it's obvious that the people who thought the birth increase was a war-time bulge were wrong," he says.

What tax source are we going to draw on to meet this need? Says Professor Jones, "Many of us feel the property tax is already overburdened. This has been the traditional source of local school revenue for school building purposes."

"Generally, we would turn next to the state. In Michigan this would mean additional forms of taxation because the sales tax is at its present rate proving inadequate. We are running about $20 million short in sales tax revenue to meet state aid to educate in full for 1956-57. There's not much likelihood of additional state aid unless we have some additional revenue measure at the state 'level' he says.

In Professor Jones' own opinion "There is not the risk of federal control in aid to school building that there might be in current operations or school salaries. Further, we have at least two instances which show we can have federal aid for education without federal control: the G. I. Bill, which was administered with very little control, and federal aid to hospital building, which most people feel has been given without much control."

New Test Car Put Into Use By MSU

The Highway Traffic Safety Center at Michigan State University in East Lansing has just acquired a traffic engineer's dream car.

On the outside it looks like any other 1956 station wagon in the low price field — if one overlooks the fifth wheel suspended from the rear. This resembles a bicycle wheel and its function is to measure mileage more accurately than the standard odometer.

But the inside of the car is another matter — at least for traffic engineers. Here, and under the hood are a number of statistical and mechanical devises designed to tell the research engineer a great many things about speed, gasoline consumption distance traveled, time elapsed, braking efficiency and the wear and tear of today's highway traveling.

In addition to engineering research, the vehicle will be used in psychological studies of driver behaviour on the highway.

Specifically, $10,000 worth of special equipment has been installed here by the Center in addition to a $10,000 statistical instrument loaned by the General Motors Proving Ground for research work now in progress by the Center. The only one of its kind in existence, its function is to determine operating characteristics of a vehicle. Its 51 counters record and measure such things as speed, gasoline consumption, deceleration and acceleration.

On a test run through Detroit the car averaged 8 miles per gallon in downtown congestion and 16 miles per gallon on the Ford Expressway. At 4:30 p.m., 70 per cent of the time downtown was at 16 miles per hour and 30 per cent was 17 to 32 miles per hour. On the expressway it worked out at 12 per cent (of the time) for speeds 0 to 16 m.p.h.; 9 per cent, 17 to 32 m.p.h.; and 79 per cent, above 32 m.p.h.

Another device plots the speed profile of the vehicle against distance or time. On the test run in Detroit, the average speed downtown was 10 m.p.h. and on the expressway it was 42 m.p.h. Delays downtown averaged 1.7 minutes every mile and almost none on the expressway.

A concealed radar speed meter and graphical recorder measures instantaneous speed runs and gaps (of other vehicles) in the traffic stream. Speed and the distance between cars are recorded for individual vehicles near the research car.

Dr. Dolf May, a member of the Highway Traffic Safety Center staff and of the Civil Engineering department of Michigan State University, under whose direction the engineering research will be conducted, claims it to be one of the best traffic research tools now in existence anywhere.

Under the direction of Dr. Abram M. Barch, Center staff member and the Psychology department, the acquisition of driving skills and the effect of situational factors on driving behaviour will be investigated.

Report Heavy Insect Infestation In Pines

Though Michigan has planted more pine trees than any other state in the union, it also has acquired an all time-high in insect infestation.

According to John L. Arend, forester at the U. S. Department of Agriculture lower peninsula forest research center, a one-package insecticide will be developed for the pine insects in the next five years.

Our needs, he says, include the development of an insect resistant tree;

Find out why the European pine shoot moth is spreading so rapidly from county to county;

And develop an aerial, one-package spray insecticide to control white pine weevil, European pine shoot moth, and sawfly.

Ground squirrels are not true squirrels, and guinea pigs are not pigs. They are rodents.
