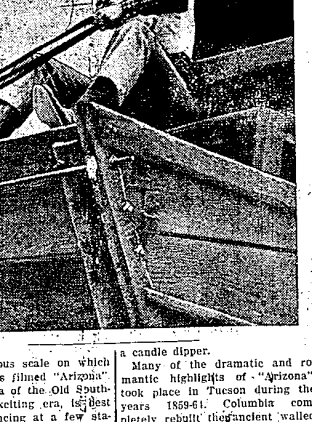
AT THE REDFORD THEATER



The stupendous scale on which Wesley Ruggles filmed "Arizona" Columbia's saga of the Old Southwest's most exciting era, is best sensed by glancing at a few statistics, for figures often speak more eloquently than words.

Based on the popular novel by Clarence Budington Kelland, "Arizona" comes Friday to the Redford Theater with Jean Arthur starred as Phoebe Titus, while William Holden portrays Peter Muncie and Warren William is a border gambler, Carteret.

"Arizona" was filmed almost entirely in that state, meaning that the producer-director and 27 studio departments had to function efficiently at a distance of 500 miles from home base.

5,000 Players

Here are some of the figures on the undertaking:

"Arizona" has 146 speaking parts, some played by well known Hollywood stars, the remainder by popular supporting artists.

It utilized 2500 atmosphere players and an equal number of Indian warriors, all selected in Arizona.

Thousands of range cattle, including Brahma steers, buffalo, cows, Mexican oxen, horses, Indian ponies, burros, sheep, goats, stray dogs, chickens, hogs and even a gila monster, were required for background atmosphere.

Properties required were gathered from all over the United States. They included authentic frontier-type vehicles, costumes, an arsenal of 5,000 guns, old-fashioned tinware and clothing, even a candle dipper.

Many of the dramatic and romantic highlights of "Arizona" took place in Tucson during the years 1859-61. Columbia completely rebuilt the ancient walled town on a milesquare site, 16 miles north of modern Tucson. This project, without precedent in motion picture history, suggests the magnitude of the entire undertaking.

200 TASTE PICKLES

Pickle manufacturing has added more science, thanks to two members of the Michigan State College staff. They submitted pickle samples sweetened with various solutions. Ideal, they found after tallying votes of 200 tasters, was a combination of sucrose and dextrose. Technically, in a 20 degree Baume sirup at 20 grains acidity there was 75 per cent sucrose and 25 per cent dextrose.

Thousands of Brazilians are seeking their fortunes in the parched districts of the once well-watered and fertile areas of the state of Minas Geraes, that has been deserted for many years. Persons fleeing the drouth-stricken regions have discovered diamonds and semi-precious stones in the dried-up river beds.

Hungary has no salt, the only food product she does not produce, which must be imported. The state of Pennsylvania has enough salt to supply the United States for 150,000 years, and Potter County alone, can keep the American people in salt for 27,000 years.

VITAMINS, UNKNOWN TO GRANDPA, FURNISH VARIETY

Great Grandpa probably never tasted a tomato salad—a stringless green bean—or a grapefruit. Great Grandpa never knew the indecision that comes from assembling a meal from a cafeteria counter. Great Grandpa never saw a "super market." And to him vitamins, protective foods or fresh spinach in December were unknown.

These are but a few of the developments that have brought changes in our food habits since Great Grandpa's day. What some of these changes have been and how they have affected our diets are pointed out by staff members at Michigan State College.

Today, we eat fewer natural and more processed and fabricated foods than we did before. Today we have a far greater variety of foods available. Tastes have changed. And there is much less difference than before in the foods eaten in different parts of the country—or from season to season.

Encouraging is the sharp increase in the past 50 years in the amount consumed of milk, tomatoes, citrus fruits and leafy green vegetables.

These are "protective" foods, noted for mineral elements and vitamins in which diets are likely to fall short.

Because Americans have come to associate whiteness in other foods with goodness, they often eat white flour, white sugar and similar kinds of foods to the exclusion of others. As a result, unwise food choices tend to offset the benefit of increased use of protective foods. And diets as they stand today often are short in calcium, and in vitamins A, B1, and C.

One new trend may lead to public adoption of the new "enriched" flour, which mills plan to put on the market soon. This flour will be enriched with vitamins and other food values in which American diets are low.

CORN SUPPLY AMPLE

Reports from the United States department of agriculture indicate the country began the year with a corn supply of 3,150,000,000 bushels of corn, nearly a record supply. Michigan farmers feeding meat and dairy animals are helping use the corn. Those who have studied this supply indicate there is enough corn and other feed on hand to produce more meat and livestock products than the American public has ever consumed in any one year.
