State's Cows Eat Beans, Vines, Pulp

No better idea of the state's diversification in agriculture can be portrayed than to scan the list of feeds that are eaten by Michigan's nearly a million dairy cows. They munch such things as baked cull beans, pea vines, mint hay, beet tops, skim milk, apple pomace and tomato pomace.

In turning out milk and butterfat from such byproducts and cull materials, the cow deserves great tribute in being able to keep up with modern industry, explains A. C. Baltzer, Michigan State College extension dairyman. He recently made a survey to find out what dairy cows were eating and what the values of these products are as dairy feeds.

Even in pioneer days when the Conestoga or covered wagons were rolling westward, the motive power was supplied by oxen or family cows. Natural feeds were the grasses available along the way, yet the animals supplied power to pull the loads, used up energy in walking and even produced milk for the family en route.

The "Gay Nineties" arrived, comments Baltzer. Industry had much to do with revision of the cow's diet.

Flour mills on the Mississippi, breweries on the Hudson and on the Ohio rivers, cotton mills in the south, flax mills in Minnesota and Wisconsin, cider mills in New York and Michigan and other industries began turning out byproducts that soon became extra feed for dairy herds.

More recent, but more important today in the feeding of dairy animals, are Michigan's own farm feeds and byproducts. Top rating for feed today goes to feeds with perhaps less romance. Cows in Michigan thrive on alfalfa hay, alfalfa-molasses silage, corn, cereal grains, corn silage, and pastures of alfalfa, alfalfa-brome grass, rye in spring and fall and sudan grass in midsummer.

Where byproducts are available, Baltzer recommends their use if they will help produce milk, help cut costs of rations and reduce labor in feeding.

Mint hay, for instance, has a value equal to clover hay in feeding. Cull beans, cooked, are worth half the feed value of soybeans or cottonseed meal. Beet pulp and molasses serve as appetizers and either is worth three-fourths the feed value of grain. Many farmers feed cull potatoes and cull apples.

Beet tops or apple pomace are almost equal to corn silage, containing just a little less protein and total digestible nutrients. Pea viney refuse, usually ensiled and often "smelly" to the tourist, rates slightly better than well-matured corn silage for dairy feeding.

Even stale bread obtained from bakeries is used at times by the wideawake dairyman. The bread is ideal as a feed and is equal to alfalfa hay in protein or to corn for total energy. Wet brewer's grain has a value equal to silage. Skim milk is rated at one gallon equal to a pound of concentrate such as soybean meal.

From the south the dairymen purchase such byproducts as cottonseed meal, cottonseed hulls, peanut meal or even peanuts. Southern dairymen feed such by products as orange peel, pineapple pulp, grapefruit pulp or grape pomace.

Pittsburgh's tonplate industry frequently but seasonally puts out a byproduct that has been fed Michigan dairy cows. This is known as palmo. Palm oil is used in tinplating. The excess oil is removed after a portion of the process by scouring with wheat middlings. The wheat middlings soak up the palm oil and the resultant byproduct, palmo, is sold as a dairy feed.

Those are some of the reasons why Baltzer rates the dairy cow as a willing cooperator in these modern and more scientific days, decades since the Conestoga pioneers whose cows ate what could be found and only delivered milk if they had sufficient energy left.

Dr. Moyer Warns State Against Paralysis

Michigan's defense against infantile paralysis this summer must begin in the home, says Dr. H. Allen Moyer, State Health Commissioner.

"Parents everywhere must remember that August is the month when polio cases usually rise toward a peak," says Dr. Moyer. "As yet, we are not able to control outbreaks, but we can prevent much of the crippling effects of infantile paralysis—by prompt medical care.

"Hot weather is polio weather, and parents should be on guard for the first symptoms of the disease. Fever, vomiting, pain or stiffness in the neck—these are common signs of polio. The physician should be called at once."

So far this summer, polio has shown no sign of a big upswing, but this cannot be taken as indicating that there will be only a moderate number of cases this year. Polio moves rapidly, as it did in last year's outbreak when a record number of cases developed after only 28 cases had been reported in July. Three hundred cases were reported in August last year and 500 in September.

In the first three weeks of July this year, 20 cases of infantile paralysis were reported to the State Health Department.

"Many communities had polio last year, and especially in these areas both parents and physicians will be on watch for the first suspicious signs of the disease," said Dr. Moyer. "Parents must be alert in order to get medical attention for their children when they need it most—in the early stages of the disease. Rest and splinting at the beginning will largely prevent crippling after-effects of polio."

Last year's epidemic totaled 1,228 cases, slightly larger than the 1931 record of 1,137 cases. The Upper Peninsula felt the heaviest weight of the 1940 epidemic. The case rate there was 115 cases per 100,000 population as compared with 24 for the Lower Peninsula. There were 27 Upper Peninsula deaths and 44 in the Lower Peninsula.
