Fluorine Harmless In Automobile Radiators

City water treated with fluorine is harmless to present-day automobile radiators, according to A. M. Wauters, chief research engineer for Ford Motor Company's Engineering Staff.

Ford engineers tested radiator materials by placing samples in saturated solutions of sodium fluoride. The solutions were 4,000 times stronger than those used in water systems of 40 cities as a deterrent to tooth decay.

Microscopic examinations of the materials after the tests showed no pitting or corrosion.
