Arguments by Teenagers Can Be Helpful, Says College Professor

Wise parents will occasionally make use of an argument, started by their teenage child, to turn it into a chance for the child to blow off steam, says William Mills, instructor in education at The University of Michigan.

"We can help the teenager greatly if we understand his real need to have somebody to argue with once in a while. To gain the self-confidence he's growing for he needs to win an occasional argument.. This will lead him to gradual control of his verbal powers and the willingness to assume responsibility for his own acts and statements," Mills states.

How does the parent know when the time is ripe for a therapeutic argument?

Mills says, "The argument can be usefully guided to help the child find relief from tensions - for instance, when he's anxious because of pressure from exams."

He points out that the child's emotional development is easily observed as most distracting to many harrassed parents. "We know there are certain sequential types of development. First, the baby is quite unaware of other people. He is angered by hunger and other dicomforts. Later, the child becomes angered through a clash of wills. The younger the child, the more parents must be alert to help him satisfy his needs.

"When it comes to a clash of wills between parent and teenage child, the parent often feels threatened because his personal integrity is challenged. His temptation is to make the child conform to his own will.

"But by doing this he creates another situation in which the child may strike out. If he can't take his feelings out on a punching bag he may strike out verbally, and this is difficult for the parent to contend with.

"What parent of a teenager hasn't sometimes been needled into a position of rebuttal?" asks Mills. "The parent probably loses him temper. But this may be all to the good. At any rate, as the child sees us lose our tempers, he will learn what is expected of him and this will contribute at least indirectly to his emotional stability and maturity.

"What's most important here is that the relations of parents and children are interrelated. They influence each other. Emotional growth is total, yet it is individual," Mills concludes.

High Schoolers Reading Talents Vary Widely

High school students show tremendous diversity in reading ability, says Warren A. Ketcham, associate professor of education at The University of Michigan.

He suggests four ways teachers can deal with this diversity:

1. Anticipate, rather than criticize, the difficulties of many high school students in covering required reading materials.

2. Provide a wide range of reading levels when selecting study materials for general subject matter areas and for specific topics - more advanced materials for bright students are as important as easy materials for students of limited ability.

3. Expect and encourage reading improvement by providing individual and group instruction in reading whenever the opportunity arises - scanning, vocabulary improvement, and reading for meaning are examples of reading skills which every teacher can help his students improve.

4. Recognize that the percentage of high school students with a severe reading disability is very small and that they are not the source of the teachers' greatest difficulties - cases of severe reading disability need clinical help, not more or better teaching.

Professor Ketcham points out, "Teaching methods and administrative plans to help teachers cope with the diversity of reading abilities among high school students will come slowly. The chief delay stems from the unwillingness of parents and teachers to consider the nature and magnitude of individual differences among high school students."

He states that the reason there are few critical studies is that "the teaching of reading is viewed as the exclusive responsibility of the elementary school. The viewpoint is so prevalent and so strong that the teaching of reading in high school is invariably labelled 'remedial', and offering it to students is interpreted as an admission that teachers in the lower grades have done an inferior job.

Ketcham reports recent studies at University High School have shown that very few students fail to grow in reading ability while attending high school. Some grow a great deal; some grow very little. A small number (approximately six per cent) show phenomenal growth, changing from deficient to capable readers.

"The reading-related problems of teachers at the secondary level do not appear to be different from those of teachers at the elementary level." Professor Ketcham concludes.

Five Suggested for The Library Board

Farmington Friends of the Library wrote the township board to suggest possible candidates to fill the vacancy left on the city-township library board by the retirement of Edward Moseman.

The names proposed by letter Tuesday night were Wendell Brown, David Mills, Mrs. Margaret Schaeffer, Mrs. R. M. Grinager, and Harry Farmer.

Three Youths Admit School Break-In

Three youths who had escaped from Boys Republic confessed breaking into the Edgewood elementary school following their apprehension, the Farmington Township police department disclosed.

They did minor damage to the building and also walked off with some pencils and pens.

They were returned to Boys Republic for disciplinary action.
