
Concept interior

The interior of the Ghia Brezza, Ford Motor Co.'s newest mid-engine concept car, suggests the two-seat EXP, on which is is based. Produced by Ford's Ghia operations in Turin, Italy, the Brezza is painted Italian racing red, trimmed in red and black, and equipped with Ghia's own sports seats.

Checking belts and hoses can prevent overheating

You're driving along and suddenly the red temperature-warning light goes on. This can happen on a long highway trip or while bogged down in a traffic jam.

In either case, it's an inconveninte experience.

The Automotive Information Council offers suggestions on how to keep that warning light from coming on (other than by pulling out the light bulb).

TO PREVENT the failure, AIC urges motorists to check all hoses in the engine compartment at least twice a year. It's a simple matter.

Squeeze the hoses. If even one feels "mushy" or shows fine cracks, it's time to repalce all of them. When one shows signs of weakness, the rest won't be far behind if they all are the same age.

The AIC also advises that all belts be checked at the same time. Look for cracks and frayed edges, and be sure they are not loose. Belt replacements also are easily accomplished, but a belt that breaks while driving can pose a real problem and possibly a ruined engine.

IF THE temperature light goes on, pull off the road and look for a hose leak. If you are prepared, you'll have some tape in the glove box or trunk.

Wrap tape tightly around the hole, add water to the radiator if available (even soda pop has been used in an emergency), leave the radiator cap loose and drive slowly to the nearest service facility for a new hose.

If a belt brakes, call for the service truck. If not available, let the engine cool and limp along until the red engine temperature light goes on again. Then stop and wait.

Better yet, says the AIC, avoid the problem by doing a hose and belt check in your driveway at your convenience.
