Jim Carrey's 'Cable Guy' delivers nervous laughs

TICKETS PLEASE

JOHN MONAGHAN

It worked for Charlie Chaplin, eventually for Woody Allen, and not well at all for Bill Murray.

Call it the "Tears of a Clown Syndrome:" the time in every comic actor's life where he begs to be taken seriously. Jim Carrey's got it in "The Cable Guy," which wants to be both poignant and hilarious and is too rarely either.

In a not-so-clever turn on the "Fatal Attraction" scenario, Carrey play a lonely cable installer who leeches onto Matthew Broderick's young profesional, a guy who has just broken up with his girlfriend. The friendship starts out harmlessly enough with a trip to the satellite dish.

Then things start to get weird. Of the 11 messages Broderick finds on his answering machine, eight are from the cable guy.

"Just blow drying my hair, thought you might have been trying to call," one says. Soon Broderick finds all aspects of his life invaded.

There are funny moments in "The Cable Guy," especially when the new friends go to a medieval-themed restaurant. Of course they end up in the jousting ring, engaging in the classic Spock-Kirk battle to the death from an old "Star Trek" episode, complete with Carrey mimicking the music.

What makes this different from Carrey's other outings is actor/director Ben Stiller, who has set himself up as a sort of conscience for Generation X. He proved with this and his earlier "Reality Bites" that he can deliver laughs in his comedies, but he wants them to be nervous ones.

Cable guy: Jim Carrey (left) the Cable Guy, taunts a jailed and helpless Steven Kovacs (Matthew Broderick) in "The Cable Guy."

Here he gives himself cameo parts as twins in a televised murder case involving former child stars that has the country wrapped up like OJ. The idea is funny (especially plugs for Eric Roberts in the inevitable TV movie), but the forced soul-searching only makes Stiller a tedious filmmaker and shallow philosopher.

Then again, you wonder how much of Stiller's treatment made it on screen with the temperamental Carrey around. Horror stories from the set of the second "Ace Ventura" movie prove that the $20 million-per-picture comedian is hell on directors.

Take the scene in the men's room of a swanky restaurant where Carrey beats up a scummy guy that's trying to move in on his friend's girlfriend. Stiller has made us dislike the victim, but when Carrey goes to work, we get only the bullying side of his humor. After while we wish he'd just leave the poor guy alone.

Broderick makes a decent straight man, though I still have trouble taking him seriously as an adult. Only occasionally does he hit on his fascination with the cable guy, who arrives like a messenger out of nowhere and sometimes offers good advice, even if it is from yesterday's Jerry Springer.

The ultimate message in "Cable Guy?" That Carrey's character the calls himself Chip Douglas after "My Three Sons") is the nightmare product of neglectful parents who set him in front of the television set. Carrey's climactic cry of "kill the babysitter" comes off hypocritical from an actor who represents the lowest form of screen comedy.
