

Now, that's Italian

New approach helps students learn language

By MARIANNE BROWN

The Italian people's ability to learn a second language is being studied by a group of researchers at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign.

For the school district, it's the fact that the Italian people have a natural ability to learn a second language that is the focus of the study. The researchers are looking for ways to help other students learn a second language more easily.

The LACOMBE technique emphasizes conversation and provides a foundation of this in grammar rules. It took Mrs. Lacombe about 14 months to complete the 201-page book, which she says is based on 20 years of teaching experience in schools and with small groups and individuals in her home. She said she was inspired to write the book because of all the books she had read on the subject of second language acquisition. She said she was inspired to write the book because of all the books she had read on the subject of second language acquisition.

Friends helped Mrs. Lacombe with having the book printed which was done at her own expense. The book is available for $1.57 per copy. The book is available for $1.57 per copy.
