Her Note in the Wrong Car

By LOUIS RAYBOLD

(Copyright.)

MARCIA CARROLL, finding herself downtown in the neighborhood of her dance's office, decided to take advantage of the fact and ride home with him. She knew just where he parked his car and could sit in it and wait for him.

She still had about twenty minutes before closing time and sauntered leisurely down the busy street. As she had expected, his car stood in its usual place. Had it not been there, she would hardly have known how to find it out of a dozen other exactly like it.

She was about to climb into the back seat in a more comfortable place to rest until Bert's arrival, when she saw a white bit of paper tucked in between the body of the car and the front door.

Her first thought was that Bert had left a note, although why he should did not at the moment occur to her any more than it occurred to her that there might be anything of a private nature about the communication—it communication it were. She and Bert had been engaged for several months and good friends for many years. They had never had any secrets from each other.

After she had read the scribbled lines, however, she sat very still, biting her lip and staring straight ahead with eyes that saw nothing.

"Will be waiting for you at the library, sweetheart. Pick me up there.

"B. R."

B. R.! B. R.! Marcia searched her brain for the name of any girl beginning with those initials whom Bert might know. Betty Buckham was the nearest she could come to it and it simply couldn't be Betty. Why, Betty had only been married to Tom Buckham a year and went about quite openly and shamelessly adoring him.

Still, thought Marcia, wouldn't that be exactly what a person would do who was secretly carrying on an affair with somebody else?

At the mere thought of anything between Bert and Betty or between him and some unknown B. R. bitter pangs of jealousy stabbed at her heart.

And because she was young and not very worldly-wise she made a wrong decision. Instead of confronting Bert with the note, she decided to say nothing at all about it but to let him give himself away and confirm her suspicions. But Bert failed to tumble into them.

But the days passed and she discovered nothing further to trouble her. The day of their wedding was nearing and already Marcia wished she had mentioned the matter at the time. Otherwise, she feared that its shadow would some time cloud their perfect happiness.

There came an afternoon when an errand to the city for material for the dressmaker who was making her trousseau gave her a really good excuse for coming out with Bert. For some time she had been too busy to do this and the affair of the note was rapidly being forgotten under the stress of the numerous wedding preparations.

It came as a shock, therefore, when, as she approached the car prepared to surprise Bert at nights, she saw a glimmer of white between the body and the front door exactly as before.

Marcia seized it and read it without scruple.

"Darlingest:

"May be late. If I'm not here when you come, better pick me up at corner of Greene and Howe. B."

Well, this time she would certainly have it out with Bert. Unless he could explain satisfactorily—which, of course, she reminded herself with a little choke, he couldn't—she would break off everything right then and there.

She couldn't believe, at that, that it was Betty Rackham. There were plenty of girls, probably some of them right in Bert's office, whose initials were B. R.

Then she saw Betty Rackham coming down the street, looking anxiously at each car she passed.

Reaching Marcia, she heaved a sigh of relief. "Well, hello, there. Glad we're going to have a passenger. You know I never know where to find Tom's car. He simply will park it all over the lot. I didn't expect to get through so early and left a note—well, where is it? I have the worst luck with notes. Here's another one gone! Did you see—

But Marcia grabbed Betty's arm as she dropped her packages in the back seat. "Is this your car, Betty?" she asked.

"Why, sure. Did you think—well, that's right. We both have these poor man's blessings, haven't we? Yes, this is our number."

Marcia hoped she did not look as foolish as she felt. "Yes, I did take it for Bert's. So I'll do a Sherlock Holmes and find the other one."

She saw the whole thing now. Just as she had this time mistaken Betty's car for Bert's, so Betty had on the occasion of the other note, mistaken Bert's for Tom's. Finding Bert's now, she got in and waited for him.

They were on their way home when Marcia, taking advantage of the semi-twilight to nestle her head on Bert's shoulder, said suddenly, "I will never have any secrets from you, darling."

"It's O. K. with me!" said Bert cheerfully.

British Monarch's Title

James I wished to use the title of "King of Great Britain" instead of "King of England and Scotland," and even went so far as to have it placed on his coins. In 1604 he asked parliament to consent to the new title, but fears were expressed lest the laws and liberties of England might be jeopardized and the commons urged that some agreement as to the terms of union precede assumption of the title. James finally yielded to the advice of his minister Robert Cecil, and the change was deferred. The title did not receive parliamentary sanction until the Act of Union, 1707.

Fairy Tales Barred to Children in Library

Paris.—Communist children are forbidden to read fairy tales. Neither "Mother Goose," Grimm's classics, "Alice in Wonderland," nor any other classic of children's literature is to be found among the 5,000 volumes of the new Communist library just opened in Belleville, a working-class quarter of Paris.

"Children should be taught only about real things and shouldn't be misled by fancies," says Chief Librarian Veterro. The library is open to working men and women. The latter may bring their young children with them. "Social emancipation of the workers through intellectual enlightenment" is the institution's program.

Tables are loaded with Communist newspapers and pamphlets. Gold letters cover the walls. The decorative scheme is dominated by red ribbons and bunting. An American card-indexing system helps readers.

Adult reading matter is even more drastically censored than children's. Of novels and light reading there is little except works in which social problems are touched in a fashion approved by Communist dogma. But there are great tomes on sociology politics and economics. Under religion the card index lists little. The art section is carefully weeded of books which might stimulate religious feeling.

The library is being conducted in connection with a "workers university," where mature men are enabled to pursue their educations in accordance with Communist ideals.

Propriety

"Is he a consistent man?"

"I should say so; he dresses up every Sunday before he tunes in the church service."

Gratifying State of Bird Life in Florida

While there is no doubt that great damage was done to the bird life of the Everglades by hurricanes in Florida, it is encouraging to know, from a report issued by the biological survey of the United States Department of Agriculture, that there are still numbers of beautiful plume birds in this region. An official recently made a trip through the Lake Okeechobee region and had an opportunity to witness a rare and beautiful sight, one that a bird lover might expect to see but once in a lifetime. At a point about ten miles east and north of Belle Glade, Palm Beach county, and as far as Pahokee, in all a distance of about 25 miles, there were thousands of American egrets and snowy egrets, stretching away as far as one could see. It was impossible to estimate the number of these beautiful birds. Within 200 yards of Belle Glade not less than 300 snowy egrets fed unmolested. While there seemed no reason for these birds gathering in such vast numbers in this territory, the sight was positive proof that the plume birds of Florida have benefited by the protection afforded them under the migratory bird treaty act.

Cat Long Considered Emissary of Witches

Cats have bulked large in the thought of both the Old world and the New. During the first of the more notable witch trials at Chelmsford, England, in 1566, it was charged that a white-spotted cat named "Satham," which received blood at night in the form of a toad and caused the death of a man who happened to touch it. An injunction widely followed was that cats must be kept away from a corpse to prevent them from mutilating it or from "taking the soul of the dead." Increase Mather wrote: "There are some who, if a cat accidentally comes into the room though they may neither see it nor are told of it, will presently be in sweat and ready to die away." In eastern Kansas a cat washing her face before breakfast forretells rain; in western Maine a storm is assured if a cat scratches a fence; in Scilly Cove, Newfoundland, tradition asserts that when a cat drowns in salt water, showers from the heavens may be expected.
