OPERATORS DRILLED IN VOICE TECHNIQUE

Practice in Vocal Inflection Is Included in Training for Telephone Work

Your speech—is it an asset or a liability?

This is a question which many people do not stop to ask themselves, being intent on what they are saying rather than how they are saying it. This is not true, however, with telephone operators, and throughout the Bell System voice classes are an important feature of the training which operators receive.

In the operator's contact with the public, a little rising inflection or gradual "curving" upward of the voice is an important point, for if she drops her voice she gives the impression of being curt and indifferent, while by raising her voice at the end, she makes one feel at once that she is interested and anxious to please. Rising inflection brings the tones to the front of the mouth and makes the final words or syllables more easily understood.

Proper enunciation brings greater accuracy and efficiency. A natural tone is a requisite. Resonance makes a voice carry. It is not necessary for the operator to talk loudly, provided she enunciates distinctly and places the tones to the front of her mouth and speaks directly into the transmitter. In this way she or anyone else using the telephone can talk very quietly and still be easily understood. Nor does the voice become tired quickly.

To speak correctly, however, is not enough. Operators are taught that there must be no strain, but rather an easy flow from one syllable to another and from one word to another. While being trained they are given various drills in the use of syllables and words, and it is grief to unable to develop the technique of her voice with such training she does not qualify as an operator.
