ter these activities, so that the south end of the park is kept as a quiet, picnic area.

Buffa has requested that the horseshoe facility be put on the park's south side.

In addition to Buffa, he said, others are pushing for additional recreational facilities including basketball and field hockey, Deadman said.

Administrators had originally turned down Buffa's request, so he brought it to the council.

"We have nothing against horseshoes — it's a great sport," Deadman said. "But there's just so much room. It's a very small park serving a very large population." The approximately 17-acre park serves residents of both Farmington and Farmington Hills, which have a facilities sharing arrangement.

The council must also look at liability factors, Deadman said, because many cities find they must now remove things — not add them — because of litigation.

"We are concerned about liability," he told Buffa. "What's at risk are the dollars of every person in this community. The teeter-totters are gone; we watch the swings very carefully."

Public services director Earl Billing said he had checked with Farmington Hills and that there are six horseshoe pits in Heritage Park, a short distance from Shiawassee Park. Buffa said he wanted something closer to his house, where he and friends could walk.

"I'm happy to be in the city of Farmington," Buffa said. "I think we're going to enjoy our stay here. We aren't going anywhere else — especially if we can get these courts."
