Stuart M. Frey, Ford vice president-Car Engineering, examines a prototype of the 2.4-liter, six-cylinder turbocharged diesel engine that Ford will purchase from BMW-STEYR for its luxury cars of the mid-1980s.

Turbo power!

Proper use of garden hose will help car live longer

It's easier to take care of your car while enjoying the warm weather of summer. Take this opportunity to bring out the garden hose to lengthen the life of your car, says the Automotive Information Council.

You may have shined up the exterior of the car, but chances are you might have forgotten about the under-fender areas, where moisture-laden road salt and or mud cling to develop a breeding ground for rust.

If left there, the debris can begin to eat away at the metal surfaces, despite the increased use of galvanized metals, zinc coatings, plastic inner liners and improved sealants.

That's where the garden hose comes in. Turn the nozzle on full force and saturate the under areas of the car.

Then use an old broom or brush to loosen up and remove the grime. Spray again to rinse away the residue.

ANOTHER BRUSHING and spray might be required if the buildup is heavy.

It's a messy job, but will be worthwhile in keeping away rust.

Some automatic car washes have installed power washes to clean these under areas so if you have one nearby you can avoid the garden hose/brush routine, but however you do it get rid of the salt, silt and sand.

At the same time, a car owner might consider cleaning a grease-coated engine by applying a solvent available at auto parts stores. The garden hose then is used to rinse away the cleaner.

Then, of course, you'll have to finish the job by cleaning the driveway.
