ARTIFICIAL "VOICE BOX" RESTORES LOST SPEECH

Restoration of the power of speech to those who have permanently lost the use of their voices through certain types of illness was not within the vision of Alexander Graham Bell when he invented the telephone. Yet it was Bell's interest in instructing the deaf, and his consequent study of speech, which led ultimately to his invention of that instrument of communication.

With the power of normal speech permanently lost through illness, he now converses by means of this artificial larynx developed at Bell Telephone Laboratories as a by-product of research in the field of speech transmission.

It is particularly appropriate, therefore, that out of the studies of the transmission of speech carried on at the Bell Telephone Laboratories should come a device which makes speech possible for persons who are entirely unable to talk because the larynx has been surgically removed or the vocal cords are paralyzed.

Called the artificial larynx, this simple apparatus was developed in its original form at the Bell Laboratories some years ago, and was distributed through an electrical supply house. Some 200 afflicted persons acquired them and their joy at being able to speak again was often impossible to describe.

A new type of this artificial larynx has been developed recently, making the older one obsolete. This is now available at cost through the local Bell telephone companies throughout the country, and the obsolete type may be exchanged for the new one without further charge. About 100 such replacements have already been made, and a like number has been distributed additionally. These figures indicate that by means of the artificial larynx, a by-product of telephone research, altogether some 300 people are talking today who expected never to be able to speak again.
