"Bussing Bees" Provided Fun For Early Settlers

Frontier communities in Michigan a century ago were not without their fun and frolic, reports a field worker of the Federal Writers' Project. While society in established towns were preparing for their winter round of receptions and parties, new and isolated villages were preparing their own form of entertainment designed to knit the inhabitants into congenial communities.

A participant in many of these parties has left the following account:

"There was the quilting frolic, the girls attending in the afternoon, the boys coming in the evening. These parties usually commenced by playing 'snap and catch 'em'—snap them up meant snapping of the fingers by a frolicker at someone of the company and was a challenge for the person to chase and catch them; the young lady, whether the capturer or captured, was always kissed—or by playing:

"Come Philander, let's be marching,
Everyone his true love searching."

(which was a marching game in which the leader called for a halt at various times to pair up new couples.) With other plays following, the program was varied to suit the company. They were often called 'bussing bees' because the kiss was sure to steal in during the various acts of the play. All in the house (even the 'antiquated maiden aunt') were participants in these amusements."
