State Department Of Health Enjoys Eighty Years Of Serving Michigan

The Michigan Department of Health, one of the pioneer organizations of its kind, observed its 80th birthday July 30, 1953.

The fifth health board established in the country, it began work at a time when the germ theory of disease, taken as a matter of course today, was not yet proved. Pasteur was at work in his laboratory in Paris and Koch in his laboratory in Berlin, but many scientists still believed in spontaneous generation of disease. They had not heard of, or at least did not accept, the explanation that tiny living organisms were responsible for typhoid fever, diphtheria, smallpox, tuberculosis and other diseases.

Isolation of the sick was thought "barbarous", sanitary science was in its infancy and patent medicines were heralded as cures for all human ills. The knowledge upon which the modern system of communicable disease prevention and control is based was just being put together, bit by bit.

In those days Michigan, according to one description, ". . . had the omnipresent marsh, the primeval forest, and ague and malaria as a natural consequence. The great expanses of "noisome swamps" gave the state a bad name. And during the damp autumn weather there was a "fearful amount of malarial fever in the state; in many neighborhoods there were not enough well persons to give a cup of cold water to the sick."

But argument for a health board was based primarily on the danger of highly explosive illuminating oils, used in virtually all homes; on the hazards of widely prevalent communicable diseases brought home from the wars, and on the sale of wallpaper with arsenic in the coloring which caused poisonings.

In the library of the Michigan Department of Health today is a volume entitled, "Shadows on the Walls of Death" containing samples of those early wallpapers.

This is the report of Dr. Robert C. Kedzie, member of the first State Board of Health, on wallpapers sold in Michigan in 1873 that contained enough arsenic coloring matter to actually poison the people living in the rooms.

Dr. Henry B. Baker, secretary of the board, served in that capacity for 30 years and is known as the Father of Public Health in Michigan.

Twenty years after its meager beginnings, the board had only eight employees other than its members and occupied only two rooms, but by 1898 when a quarter centennial was observed, the Chicago Health Commissioner said that the Michigan Board of Health had "made growth more perfect, decay less rapid, life more vigorous, and death more remote for every citizen within the boundaries of this fair state."

Three dates between 1873 and 1933 stand out in the advance of state public health service in Michigan. One is 1919, when the Legislature abolished the cumbersome State Board of Health and vested its powers and duties in a State Health Commissioner, with a State Council of Health to act in an advisory capacity to the Commissioner.

The second significant date was 1921, when the Department, by Legislative action, began the free distribution of biologic products for the treatment and prevention of communicable diseases. At that time, Michigan had the unenviable distinction of having the highest diphtheria death rate of any country in the world.

The third memorable date was 1927, when the Legislature gave to county boards of supervisors authority to establish full-time county or multi-county health departments. Strong, full-time local health departments were long recognized by the Michigan Department of Health as being the foundation of a good public health program. Of the state's 83 counties, 70 now have the services of such full-time local health departments serving 90 per cent of the people of Michigan.

Today Michigan's Department of Health, located on 400 acres just outside of Lansing, occupies 28 buildings, has branch laboratories in Houghton, Powers and Grand Rapids and employs 600 persons. Public health workers from all parts of the world come to Lansing to study under its professional personnel, many of whom are ranked among the highest in their fields.

Students at the University of Detroit Summer TV Institute came from as far away as New Orleans, Louisiana, while instructors flew in from Chicago and New York.

STATE OFFICERS WORK TOGETHER TO AVERT MISHAP

State police, conservation officers and parks rangers worked together recently to prevent, in the nick of time, what could easily have been a tragedy.

A Grand Rapids man, visiting Grand Haven state park, was scheduled to take some medicine from a bottle he was carrying, at 6:00 p.m. one evening recently.

But he had been given the wrong bottle before leaving for the popular state park, and contents of the bottle in his possession could easily have killed him.

State police and conservation officers were told by radio of the danger and rushed to the park. With the aid of parks workers, the man was finally located -- at 5:45 p.m. -- and the dangerous bottle exchanged for the proper medicine.
