TO DEMONSTRATE MARL EXCAVATION METHODS
The method of excavating marl with the Musselman bucket is to be demonstrated at two places in Oakland County between October 11 and 14. The demonstration is sponsored by the Agricultural Engineering Department of the Michigan State College and the County Agricultural Agent, K. D. Bailey. The schedule for the demonstrations is as follows:

October 11 and 12th, Russell Mayhew, 2 miles Southeast of Clatsion.

October 13 and 14th, Ray Bradford, 1 1/2 miles East of Oxford. Marl is used as a substitute for limestone in correcting soil acidity, this being essential for the production of many crops. Oakland County is fortunate in having hundreds of deposits, many of which have been opened. Included among these are deposits owned by George Haack, South Lyon; Standard Gravel Co., New Hudson; and Dr. A. Holden, Wixom.

"Untouched By Human Hands"

"Processed and packaged without the touch of a human hand," is the advertising slogan of a new product that appears on trucks of the manufacturer, running around the streets of Detroit. Within the past 20 years astonishing strides have been made in hygiene in all fields, and conspicuously in preparing foods for the market. These marvels of invention and device have impressed us with a high regard for man's genius at contrivance.

But in this day of depression, we read those words, "untouched by human hands," a bit more critically. The thought comes instantly what this means. It means, (beneficial to health though it may be) that many human hands which had work to do before do not have it now. And again, as many times each day, we have borne in upon us the painful fact that man's inventive genius has failed, almost disastrously, to contrive a system by which there will be for the possessors of willing hands, always work for those human hands to do.

Puzzles For Editors

Every vocation has its vexations, every one presents puzzling problems to be decided from time to time. But probably few bring one face to face with more trying dilemmas, more difficult decisions to be made, than the business of conducting a newspaper.

There is, for instance, the matter of elections—always a trying time for the journalist, particularly the editors of small newspapers. It is not merely that every candidate has his friends, and among them are certain also to be some friends of editors, but there arise a myriad of other questions, too, questions that must be decided, and the decision of which is almost sure to be a disappointment to someone here and there—if not to folks "on both sides of the fence".

A striking example of the kind of situation that presents itself to newspaper folks developed in the primary campaign, and it was a dilemma that made a conscientious editor long for the wisdom of a Solomon. On Tuesday, September 6, some if not all of the weekly newspapers of Oakland County received a letter from a woman living in one of the towns in the County. The letter came just two days before most papers went to press with their last issue before the primary election. It contained some drastic statements, attacking one of the candidates for sheriff, making some very serious charges against him and his conduct as an officer. It accused him of brutality toward a woman who had been arrested on suspicion three years ago. The letter declared that she had been treated so cruelly that her family feared for a time that she might even be mentally affected. Later she was released, and in substantiation of the charges, the letter related that the officer's superior, the sheriff, had paid a substantial sum in damages to settle the suit out of court. The case number and date of settlement were given, so there could be no question on that score. The letter concluded to the effect that this man was unfit to be placed by the voters in a higher office after what he had done in a subordinate position.

It might seem at first as if there was no problem at all for an editor in this. Here was a communication for publication as a "letter to the editor." And of all the things which true journalists value most, it is the good name of their newspapers for fairness and especially their reputation for being willing to "print both sides" of any controversy. Even the most biased of newspapers, politically and otherwise, will not permit any interference with the "peoples column." It is the most sacred place, the real "sanctum sanctorum" of newspapers. No one and no influence can close its door to the people; no matter whom those people may attack or even how vigorously they may disagree with the newspaper itself.

What then, of the letter mentioned above? If it had every right to be printed, and yet there were circumstances about its being submitted that gave reason to pause. In the first place, it was evidently timed to reach the newspapers just in time to insure its being published in the last issue before the election, and to prevent the man attacked from making an answer. Yet the case had been in court two years before and the money settlement had been made more than a year before. The man attacked had been a candidate for three months. If the writer of the letter had not wanted to be unfair, why did she not write a little earlier, say even one week sooner, thus giving the man attacked an opportunity to answer?

"To print or not to print," that was the question. Besides the other arguments in the negative there was this fact, that after the primary there would be another election. If the candidate mentioned in the letter was unsuccessful, no serious harm would be done in withholding it from publication. If he was nominated, there still remained opportunity to the correspondent to publish her message declaring him "unfit," and to try to prevent his election.

So the editor, still a bit doubtful as to whether his decision was right, "put the paper to bed" that week with the letter still on the "copy-hook" instead of in type.

Was he right or wrong?

"20,000 Hear Roosevelt," read the headlines on one Detroit newspaper Monday morning. "100,000 cheer Roosevelt," enthusiastically proclaimed another. "60,000 Greet Roosevelt" reported the third.

Well, it's pleasant to live in a place like that and be able to read anything you want to read.
