Homeside Readjustment

There is a growing uneasiness among those close to the readjustment problems of the returning veterans which calls for prompt recognition.

The source of this feeling is not to be found in the Serviceman's Readjustment Act of 1944—the G.I. Bill of Rights—with its broad program for rehabilitation through hospitalization, education, loans and unemployment benefits.

No—the framework of readjustment as provided by law and regulation is ample, in fact more than ample, in the opinion of many. As a Nation, the United States has marched far from the land-grant benefits given to the ragged Continentals mustered out after the Revolution.

Where, then, shall we look for the cause of this feeling, now no larger than a spot on the peacetime horizon? Right in our own mirrors! We, the families of our servicemen, are causing this vague but growing feeling of uneasiness among those studying the readjustment problem.

Farsighted, experienced observers call now for a "homeside readjustment." Too much, they say, has been emphasized about readjusting the fighting men. Incidents of Naval veterans removing their combat ribbons to avoid ill-advised questioning, and of infantry-men from the Italian front taking off their honored shoulder patches to escape thoughtless inquiries are straws in the wind.

It is the wartime duty of us all to search deeply into our motives as we eagerly step forth to help in the great opportunities of readjustment. Let there be no unwise probing into combat-packed hours. Let the Golden Rule guide every step and temper our grateful enthusiasm.

Can we not turn as did Solomon when he was called on to face great problems and great opportunities and ask for "an understanding heart?" That might well be the start for "homeside readjustment."
