WHITE PINE DAYS celebration at Ontonagon, in Michigan's Upper Peninsula, is a monument to an idea that rebuilt a dying city.

Morris F. LeCroix, mayor, pushed for 20 years' practical process to refine low grade copper ore economically. His vision, which finally became fact, is responsible for the economic rebirth of the area.

The White Pine mine at Ontonagon closed down 20 years ago when rich ore supplies ran out; is now in full production again.

The celebration this year took place June 9-11. Visitors come from miles to attend the program of parades, parties, banquets and shows. They witnessed the excitement in the revitalized copper city and enjoyed the serene quietness of the beautiful northern forests as a contrast.

WARM? - GEOLOGIST REVEALS COOLING FACTS ABOUT STATE

If you're bothered by summer's heat it may be a relief to know that at one time a tremendous Ice Age glacier covered a large part of Michigan.

The last ice of that sort disappeared from this region only about 30,000 years ago, says Russell C. Hussey, professor of geology at the University of Michigan.

After the ice had inhabited this region during the warm inter-glacial periods, he stated, although other parts of the United States were occupied by tremendous elephants and mastodons roamed around Michigan then. The ancestral home of these creatures, many millions of years ago, was Africa, and they migrated to the United States by way of some old land bridge, which has since disappeared.

As a protection against the cold, the animals developed a layer of fat just beneath the skin, and on the outside a heavy layer of matted wool, and long, coarse, reddish-brown hair, professor Hussey says.

The mastodon was especially common around Ann Arbor, and its bones have been found in many of the swamps and bogs near the city. The bones of the mastodon are frequently found showing marks made by the teeth of wolves of other predatory animals that were accustomed to feed upon the carcasses, states the geologist.

Complete bodies of the Woolly Elephant, similar to the ones that lived in Michigan, have been found frozen into the soil and ice of Siberia, where they have remained in cold storage for centuries, with the flesh preserved in such a fresh condition that dogs were able to eat it after the dogs had been exposed.

State Orders Hunting Licenses For Fall Season

The Conservation Department is ordering 1,700,000 hunting licenses in anticipation of the coming fall seasons.

The order this year is about the same as last year.

About 1,200,000 of the licenses were sold last year and state workers anticipate little change from that total this year.
