One state official said the invasions normally follow mild winters after which the foliage and the stemmed crops, white pine, spruce, barley—develop and mature early.

MICHIGAN'S campaign against trespassing on state-owned submerged lands in the Great Lakes has taken another turn.

Months ago, the state started legal action against owners of the S. S. Western States, a former lakes passenger ship now tied up at Tawas City and described by its owners as a "float."

The boat is used as a hotel, meals are served and other facilities provided.

But because it rests on the bottom of Lake Huron, the state has ruled it is trespassing on land reserved for hunting and fishing by an 1898 state law which never has been repealed.

The case against the boat is still pending. Now comes another boat, this one a scow in Lake St. Clair which is towed out and used as a floating fishing dock.

The state ruled that because it floats and does not touch bottom, the legality of a boat and therefore does not trespass on state-owned property.

"That's the only difference," said one state legal expert.
