Ask Hana (Questions on Hairstyles And Beauty)

(Questions on hair style and beauty will be answered through this column by addressing your letters to this newspaper. Letters do not have to be identified.)

Dear Hana:
My husband and I have a daughter 17 years old. She dropped out of high school as a sophomore and hasn't done anything in a year. She can't find a job, and won't help around the house, so my husband and I decided to send her to beauty school. Can you recommend a good school, but one that is easy enough for a drop-out to make. We think this is nice, clean work and understand that there is a big demand for beauty operators.

place in the school and not in the salon, as some schools claim.
I have had occasion to talk with high-school counselors who claim that many students make no attempt to complete high school simply because they have decided to send her to beauty school. Can you recommend a good school, but one that is easy enough for a drop-out to make. We think this is nice, clean work and understand that there is a big demand for beauty operators.

Dear Mrs. R. L.:
What an appropriate time to answer this letter. School is out and there are many parents in a turmoil as to what to do with their teenagers in the coming school year. You are right on one thing: there is a demand for good hairdressers. All schools in the state of Michigan must comply with rules set by the state. Upon completion of 1,200 hours, a state board examination is required at which time, if the student passes, a license is granted.

For many years, I have been actively employed in the field of beauty culture. Being an operator, teacher for a leading school of cosmetology and presently self-employed, I have seen many tragic cases of graduate students from inadequate schools. The result being, that upon graduation as operators they cannot be absorbed into the industry due to their inabilities and lack of knowledge. Again, they find themselves drop-outs only with a license this time.

I am not in the position to recommend but I must warn you to choose a school carefully. The Department of Education offers a rank-order classification of all existing schools with recommendations. You are wrong when you say that you and your daughter feel that you want an easy school to graduate from. Learning should take

With proper attitude and selection of a good school, the possibilities are unlimited in the industry. There is a place for everyone, but it's not easy.
