Women who toured Birmingham's Hunter House in the year it was built — 1922 — most likely wore pure white dresses, covered their heads with caps and put high heeled shoes on their feet. For a more comfortable tour of the historic house consider Calvin Klein's layered look with, what else, walking shoes.

season, Dmitri takes the black out of the tuxedo and replaces it with eggshell satin.

Together, the two of you certainly will turn heads, but in envy, not disgust.

Hare has another gown that is terrific for a major event, such as the opening of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. His full-length mohair tube dress with matching coat and head wrap would be as stunning there as it was on a New York runway.

Perhaps, instead of an ultra evening gown, your heart is set on Bill Blasi's soft white sweater, over loose pants and a silk, softly bowed blouse. This is definitely not a go-to-work ensemble, but it can go to Meadow Brook Theatre, the Music Hall and the Fisher.

Though theater crowds vary in appearance, dressed up but casual is the general mood.

Men, too, can fill the role by wearing their three-piece suits and unbuttoning their shirts. Ties aren't necessary, unless you feel naked without one.

Another kind of theater that is gaining popularity around Detroit is one where people can relax over dinner, followed immediately by a play.

A few changes in criteria are necessary, however, when getting dressed for The Community House in Birmingham, The Botsford Inn in Farmington or the Mercy College dinner theaters.

You will be eating, drinking and sitting with little or no movement in between courses or acts.

What you put on must accommodate the physical activity—which means binding skirts or double-breasted jackets won't work, because they're too confining.

However, Albert Capraro does a stunning dinner dress in a silky print, with lots of fabric, a belt and a mandarin collar. It's chic, but not too, and it offers plenty of room for comfort.

The man can try a simple jacket over pants, with an unbuttoned shirt, provided everything is well tailored.
