I had planned to fill this space this week with a report on how the month of May, high school seniors and the high school opening a musical show the same night.

It did happen that way, and we did have to split forces.

The head of our family, who could get only one evening away from his newspaper, was at the high school to see his No. 3 daughter joining the entourage of Music Man (Harold Hill) and Martin the Librarian, and I went with one big sister to hear our youngest render a few incidental roles on the French horn while her band and orchestra performed.

WE ALL MANAGED too to get to the high school to view the musical during its three-evening run, although it took some real car shuttling to accomplish that.

By MARGARET MILLER

So this column was going to be about how well our girls performed (which they did) and how much we enjoyed it (which indeed we did) and how much I appreciate all the work on the part of music and drama teachers that makes for these opportunities (which I do, in full measure).

BUT THEN the weekend ended with Mother's Day, and the member of the family, who studies instead of getting onto a platform, managed to upstage everybody.

And I can't let it occasion pass without thanking her publicly for one of the nicest gifts I've received in a lot of Mother's Days.

She had delivered into an old envelope full of eight or nine years worth of Memos, as well as into our drawer of more years than that of family snapshots.

We all enjoyed reading the book, but no one more than this mother who had written every word.

EVERYBODY'S IN IT including a grand-mother and a dog no longer with us, matched in picture and column report. She said she had fun figuring out which columns were earlier, since most had not been dated, but in some cases it wasn't terribly hard because of ages mentioned.

We all enjoyed reading the book, but no one more than this mother who had written every word.

It's going to be treasured a long time; along with the memories of a great junior high concert and a splendid high school musical.
