SC bond issue is separate from millage

What does Schoolcraft College's June 14 millage proposal have to do with all the talk about a $10 million bond issue and a fine arts facility?

"To some degree they are tied," said board Chairman Paul V. Kadish, although voters won't be deciding directly on the bond issue.

The college board has authority to float the bond issue and levy the millage needed to pay it off, regardless of what voters decide.

On the other hand, it wouldn't be able to operate programs without the millage.

"NO CLASSROOM-TYPE buildings are in the bond issue," added President C. Nelson Grist. "These are becoming available in the K-12 districts."

All projects in the bond issue are special-use types of buildings that couldn't be obtained by leasing space from K-12 districts, they said.

Kadish and the board of trustees approved seven items in the capital construction program last February when they approved the bond issue.

Completing the culinary arts addition, constructing a new learning resources center, remodeling the Bradner Library, constructing a fine arts facility (auditoriums and instructional space), constructing an addition to the Applied Science Building, constructing an addition for student affairs for the Waterman Campus Center and an engineering study for future development.

KADISH SAID some existing facilities are far less than adequate.

The financial aids office is in a trailer. A "temporary" block building has been in use 11 years. Four houses with septic tanks are used as college offices of one kind or another, including payroll. Water must be carried to them.

The direct impact of the bond issue is lessened, he said, because other bonds from past years are being paid off.
