The youngest member of our club is also the shortest.

Not that she's really all that small and not that age really has a great deal to do with the situation. With us, the next smallest is the oldest, and Sister No. 3 has just managed to overtake and pass Sister No. 2 in the matter of height.

But being the youngest and of short stature does pose a few problems for someone choosing a family that likes to travel. Considering the number of comments that come her way, I sometimes wonder at her good nature.

By MARGARET MILLER

LIKE WHEN ONE of her sisters asked her to get an item that turned out to be stored on an upper shelf.

"I can't reach it," she pleaded.

"No excuse, GROW!" came back the answer.

Of the time she started off on an errand and announced she'd be back shortly.

"How could you be back any other way?" someone wanted to know.

There have been suggestions that she play basketball (shortstop), make Christmas cookies (shortbread), consider secretarial work (short-hand) or confine her reading to short stories.

SHE BOLE UP patiently when one sister announced she had better use the excess strawberrones for shortcake instead of a pie.

She even laughed dutifully when another reported gleefully after a come trip that all her friends had mentioned who ought to be along to use the short puddles.

But she did raise an eyebrow when I started verbally listing some of these instances when her diminutive stature has been a conversation piece.

"What are you going to do, write a Memo?" she asked suspiciously.

"Don't worry," she was assured. "It will be a short one."
