Hoses can be handy

By PATRICK KELLY

Keeping a garden hose handy for the car may sound silly, especially if you go to a car wash in this kind of weather.

But if you use it a few times on recent days in the undercarriage areas, the washing will pay big dividends when spring arrives.

Spraying under fenders and other areas, which even car washes don't reach, will help remove road salt, dirt and other build-ups which help breed rust. Adjust the nozzle to a high-pressure spray. An old brush will help break up residue, permitting it to be washed away more easily.

It's a somewhat messy job, but it will be worth it in the long run because a car's rust often starts in these hidden areas.

At the same time, wash grime off the door sills and, more importantly, the under portions of the doors, plus the tailgate of a station wagon.

Applying a coat of wax to these areas at least once before and once during a winter will help fend off rust.

When applying the wax to the under parts of the doors, you will be able to see small drain holes. These holes often are plugged with undercoating, in addition to dirt. Make sure they are cleaned out to prevent water build-up inside the doors. A small screwdriver or penknife will do the job.

Water from the high-pressure sprays in car washes sometimes can get into the housing for parking and tail lights, so take a close look, and if they contain water, merely loosen the retaining screws—the water should run out.

Finally, drain the garden hose outside before putting it back in the garage. That will prevent water freezing to ice on the floor and, otherwise, the hose might freeze up and become an undependable object the next time you want to use it.
