FIGHTING TOOLS OF OUR SOLDIERS

Standardized Equipment, Quality, Efficiency, Determine Advantage Over Enemy.

WORK OF ORDNANCE BRANCH

Department Has in Washington Alone 3,000 Officers With Thousands of Civilian Employees and Many Being Added.

By JAMES H. COLLINS, [From Its Committee on Public Information, Washington, D. C.]

Of all the large activities conducted by Uncle Sam in his establishment, the work of our fighting industry, the results secured on the battle front. These results will be secured by the American military officer trained to design the equipment of an army, and the weight or exportation both from military men of other nations and capable business men in this country who are working with the war department is to the effect that we have a good system of development as exists.

In ordinary times our requirements for fighting tools are so small that they can be supplied as an incident to peaceful industry. The American military officer was able to enter upon the design of rifles, guns and ammunition, turning his blue prints and specifications over to manufacturers who were waiting to bid against each other for the design he furnished he simply advertised for bids and secured deliveries through the penalty clause in government contracts, and saw that quality was maintained by careful inspection of material delivered.

For several months after war was declared the ordnance department found its whole scheme of organization fairly satisfactory, and for a reason which was apparent to everyone when it is stated. Regardless of the magnitude of our war task and the urgency which has not been lost sight of our new army and our war preparation has been to the effect that our order program of growth. Soldiers for the army had to be drafted and trained. This was work which would consume months of time to do on a large scale.

The first place, they have been wonderfully amplified in recent years by the use of power, and increased in compactness and complexity. Practically every labor-saving contrivance which has appeared in the past has been applied to present-day war. The machine excavator that I use my water and sewer pipe quickly in peace times can be taken into the trench and construction work, power plants, telephone and telegraph systems and railroad transportation far beyond peace requirements for such requirements must be under the pressure of war's emergency.

STIRRED HIS FIGHTING BLOOD

Irishman More Than Willing to "Do His Bit" in Conflict With the Hated Enemy.

An auctioneer had been selling horses all day and his voice was getting hoarse. He was so tired that he was economizing as much as possible in the use of words and even syllables.

When McGarity, attracted through curiosity by the crowd, came up to the auctioneer he further abbreviated his speech, and was crying, "One hun, two hun, can't I get three hun?"

War Engineers in Charge. The ordnance department is now arranged in a way that makes it an efficient, self-contained agency for the modern industrial production under competitive conditions, seeks advantage by standardization of equipment, large scale production and centralized activity in the manufacturing tools so that a little increase in output here or a little increase in cost there will enable a given workman or factory to outstrip competitors.

The soldier on the fighting front is not unlike a modern factory. Modern industrial production, under competitive conditions, seeks advantage by standardization of equipment, large scale production and centralized activity in the manufacturing tools so that a little increase in output here or a little increase in cost there will enable a given workman or factory to outstrip competitors.

It was along this great general trend of modern war, the making of better fighting tools, that the recent reorganization in the ordnance department was carried out. When it was declared we had an establishment of military men whose business it was to design tools of war. They not only knew how these tools were made, but they kept track of improvements in fighting tools in every modern army, and the almost daily changes in the way fighting tools are used. That was their job, and they corresponded in every respect to the technical men in any peaceful industry, making researches and tests and utilizing all the refinements of invention and design to keep pace with competitors in war equipment, and secure every advantage possible.

CITY'S GLORY LONG DEPARTED

Ruins Testify to Existence of Once Mighty Metropolis in South-eastern Africa.

In a far-off corner of southeastern Africa, hidden from the ruins of a once mighty city, called in present times the Ziphahwe, or buildings of stones. The more fanciful of the scientists declare that the time of Moses may have seen the building of these crumbling walls, but the weight of evidence seems to prove that the city is only about centuries old. Whatever the true date of the city's history, certainly its ruins today are in appearance very old, very moss hung and very picturesque.

There is nothing sad about the slipping away of these relics of the past, so gradually they have sunk into the soil and broken down with the pressure of time and weather. Their day of glory and prosperity was over some centuries ago, and they rest dreamily in the sunshine. Bright flowers deck the walls of the ruins, and the remaining stones together and tall trees spread their branches wide to temper the heat of the midday sun and shelter the stones from the chill of the evening.
