Motorized bicycles spur controversy

Sharing the road—a's a never-ending battle. Back and forth it goes, as motorists and bicyclists argue among themselves over who has the right-of-way on the road—the car or the bike.

While these two factions have been warring among themselves, another vehicle recently has emerged on the scene, it's the motorized bicycle.

Lately, there has been a lot of complaints from motorists that these motorized bikes create hazards as the riders amassly meander in and out of traffic.

Police are quick to argue that there is cause for concern.

While the motorized bikes move faster than our conventional bicycles, many say they must remain at the side of the road as should most other bicycles.

But some motorized riders claim they own the road as much as cars.

To put the story straight, Michigan law says bikes have the same right to the road as cars.

While most bike riders often avoid the busy roads because they fear for their lives, the law declares that the roads are meant to be shared.

But as more bikes hit the roads, more motorists become infuriated by the constant presence of bikes alongside their vehicles.

And lately, the motorized bikes seem to be compounding the frustrations of motorists.

At the same time, bicyclists' frustrations are aggravated even more because they are the ones who must withstand the constant threat of cement trucks, big cars and careless drivers.

So, the battle continues, mainly because motorists are unaware of the rules of the road and the bicyclists' right to travel the same route as cars.

Fancy cars, little bikes and big cars—they all must learn to share the road before the battle can end.

The motorized bicycle recently has become popular among all age groups, but its presence on the road has added another spark in the continuous battle of sharing the road. (Staff photo by Bob Woodring)
