Cville teachers settle contract

Clareville School District and teachers' union negotiators have reached a tentative agreement on a new two-year contract which includes an average of a six per cent salary hike in the new fiscal year and a salary reopener the following year.

The agreement was reached after a negotiating session that ended about 4:15 p.m. Friday.

The lack of a settlement during the last week before the opening of school for teachers, scheduled for Sept. 7, wasn't a problem since negotiators for the school board and union agreed last week to extend the expiring contract for at least six weeks.

The new contract replaces a three-year pact which expired Aug. 31.

David McDowell, school superintendent, said that a five per cent retirement payment by the board will be made for teachers, who previously paid the contribution on their own.

The other one per cent will go for fringe benefit improvements.

There were also minor changes in contract language, McDowell said.

The wording of the new contract will be worked out by the chief negotiators for the board and Clareville Education Association, which represents 180 teachers in contract talks.

When the contract language is completed, the board and CEA membership will be asked to ratify it.

The CEA has never struck the district of 3,800 students although a contract was ratified after the opening of school in two instances.

Teachers are scheduled to report to their
