

Hey, look me over

When the 16,000 dinners were served last year at the Rotary chicken barbecue, it set a mark for the entire country according to unofficial figures gathered in a recent survey.

The fact that the 16,000 dinners were served in little more than six hours, also set a record that the Rotarians hope to duplicate this year.

While the Plymouth barbecue is now becoming known around the country, comparisons are being made with other service club activities.

One of the major events in recent years is the baked bean meal served on the Boston Commons. This is an all-day and evening affair and is said to have attracted 21,000 diners.

Nothing else comes close according to the survey. But the idea of the chicken barbecue is now being copied in many areas. Several of them are held outstate with great success. And the list is growing.

The latest to join the list is the Marine City Lions Club that served more than 600 dinners this year during the afternoon and evening period.

The Lions, like the Plymouth Rotary, use the proceeds from the dinner for its charitable work. To make the dinner even more attractive (if that is possible) the Lions have added home made baked beans to the menu and the diners serve themselves at long tables.

Several of the outstate communities are planning to send representatives to this year's barbecue just to find out how Plymouth does it—with the special boxes for serving the meal as the chief attraction.
