The lady on the telephone wondered why our newspaper doesn't print more recipes. "Other papers have them," she told me. "I've been looking for recipes for zucchini. It's such a short season when it's good and I want to know more ways to cook it." Surely there could be no problem of lack of space, she went on, and then asked, "Why don't you print more recipes instead of using what that woman writes about her family all the time?" I apologized for using up space and she continued in a similar, but most pleasant manner. She didn't want to offend me, but she thought I was failing in my responsibility.

"Why don't you give us some of your new recipes for zucchini?" she asked.

WELL, MY AIM is certainly to please our readers, but, as for zucchini, that's a difficult one. For one thing, our clan tends to be unadventurous in eating habits, especially where vegetables are concerned. And these days, with everyone going in five directions, we don't do a great deal of recipe-testing or even mass enjoying of long-time favorites. It's a while since we've all been home for the absolutely unbeatable bouillabaisse the man of our house can concoct, though this summer we've enjoyed the way he makes our outdoor grill perform.

BUT I'M SUPPOSED to be coming up with recipes.

At least once a week, on mother's night to work, a likely meal is a can of pork and beans with slices of hot dogs.

For our youngest, a gourmet treat is a frozen chicken pot pie, but this is permitted only occasionally because of the high price of heating the oven.

We have a tuna casserole that appears often, corn fritters that go well with bacon, a carrot and raisin salad that no one else seems to have heard of, and, recently, we've had a lot of banana bread because the bargain bananas were getting soft.

But no zucchini in the files of my recipe book and memory.

THEN, SORTING through the mail at work, suddenly there surfaced a recipe for Zucchini Tortie.

According to the directions, saute (yes, I do know that word) a pound of sliced sweet Spanish onions with a pound and a half of grated zucchini.

Then add butter, cracker crumbs, two beaten eggs, grated parmesan cheese and salt and pepper. You bake it all in a pie plate at 350 degrees for 40 or 45 minutes.

I hope that may please my caller. There's at least as much zucchini as family.

Come to think of it, it sounds pretty good and I may try it myself. But I won't tell anyone it's zucchini.
