A colleague of mine reported on a problematic homecoming a few nights back.

It seems she had forgotten to buy catfood during the weekend shopping tour, and she remembered when a hungry and therefore affectionate pet met her at the door.

"It was late when I got home, and I didn't feel like going back out, and anyway most of the stores aren't open late any more because of the energy situation, and the poor kitty was so hungry and... well, anyway, we're having the rest of the salmon for dinner tonight."

A satisfactory if expensive solution to a momentary lapse, but one that has been ruled out for me by the independent animal that shares our home.

It isn't that she doesn't care for salmon. If I'm preparing it for dinner, she's right there rubbing around the ankles begging a sample.

She gives the man of our house like treatment when he cuts up chicken to be fried, or trims a steak, or goss going on one of his famous fish dinners.

She probably would even make a meal of any of these delicacies—as long as there's plenty of catfood on the shelf.

But I've never yet been able to interest her in a substitute if I goof on the shopping or run out.
