New standards set for mail

Present regulations on minimum sizes of mail will be expanded to all classes of mail and types of service effective April 15, 1978, says the U.S. Postal Service.

Regulations will be amended to prohibit all items which are less than .007 inches thick; and all items, other than keys and identification devices, which are 25 inches thick or less and are not rectangular, or are less than 35 inches in height or less than five inches in length.

To encourage the use of standard size mail and to compensate the Postal Service for added costs of handling nonstandard items, first class mail and airmail weighing one ounce or less will be declared nonstandard and will be subject to a surcharge in addition to the applicable postage and fees.

Also covered under the surcharge will be single piece third class mail weighing two ounces or less which has a height-to-length ratio which does not fall between 1-1.3 and 1-2.5 inclusive or exceeds the following limitations: height-6.125 inches; length-11.5 inches; and thickness-25 inches.

The surcharge will be determined at a later date.

The changes in the mail classification were necessary to establish a standard size range for mail that is compatible with the operating limits of the mail processing equipment employed by the Postal Service, officials say.

Undersized and nonstandard mail is expensive to process for several reasons, officials explain.

Such mail cannot be distributed on letter sorting machines and causes disruptive delays in the facing-cancelling operation as the odd sized letters and cards become jammed in the machinery, "exploding" letters and cards across the workroom which damages the odd sized pieces and others as well.

The undersized and non-standard mail is therefore processed manually at substantially higher postal processing costs.

The expanded minimum size requirements and the newly established nonstandard requirements were the subject of hearings by the Postal Rate Commission.
