

Schools aren't the "drag," to use teen jargon, that they were in the days of McGuffey and Greeley, when the over-30s went to school.

Take a look around the campuses of Observerland high schools, and you'll see a bright new breed of Americans growing into the role of innovative helmsmen of the relevant world.

This isn't just book-learning, the education of today.

This is preparation of the WHOLE person.

This is the way they are readied for the world of tomorrow — the world of business, of work, of the professions, of social service.

It is still more.

This is not only education for the operation and administration of a trillion-dollar economy. This is education for the non-monetary roles — the roles of fathers, mothers, citizens!

This is not the education of adolescents, who are to be saddled by rules of dress and grooming. Rather it is the education of young adults by meaningful experience.

This is . . .

Education For Democracy!

(We are, of course, indulging in irony. The point is to show the effect of the relaxing and eliminating of high school dress codes at local schools. Observer photos)
