Something to Worry About.

Considering how little is accomplished, one sometimes wonders if it is really worth a hungry elephant's time to eat so small a thing as a penny.

In Chinese Gardens.

Chinese gardeners sometimes plant statues of clay men firmly in pots just like real plants, and then till live evergreen to grow up over their statues. The vines thus form a kind of robe for the statue and for the brief last term of their existence have no thought but to love and be loved. I should have set youth at the end of the human span—From "The Garden of Delicacy" by Anatole France.

At the End—Youth.

If I had created men and women, I should have framed them on a type widely different from that which has actually prevailed—the type of the big mammoth. I should have made men and women, not to resemble the great apes as they do, but on the model of insects which, after a life as caterpillars, change into butterflies, and for the brief last term of their existence have no thought but to love and be loved. I should have set youth at the end of the human span—From "The Garden of Delicacy" by Anatole France.

AFTERNOON FROCKS

When customers have bustled themselves for weeks turning out numbers of beautiful and graceful afternoon frocks they come to a place where they take time to explore occasional by-paths of fancy. Then we are treated to a few odd and sometimes amusing ideas in frocks of varieties quite different from those that have gone before. This large, graceful, and simple to the styles and sometimes prove to be the forerunners of new models. After a survey of this season's afternoon frocks the two models pictured here are more than likely to be pronounced "odd," but with the concession that they are pleasing.

Satin and georgette were made for each other and join forces in the quick-looking frock on the left, the left of the picture. A plain satin skirt is the foundation for a short, full skirt of georgette, which in turn supports three bands of satin. In the bodice the order is reversed and the crepe provides the under portion and furnishes the long sleeves. The short-sleeved peasant waist worn over it has a double row of small round, satin-covered buttons down the front, set very close together. All its edges are piped with satin-covered cord. This frock must stand or fall on its own merits, as it has nothing in the way of precedent to lean upon in the season's showings.

The dress on the right starts out with a plain skirt of satin and finishes up with a very short tunic and bodice of the same material. For once georgette crepe plays no part in the story. The tunic is shorter at the left side than at the right and manages to make place for three bands of satin and also contrives to look frivolous. A full bodice and wide, crushed grille lead such a flavor of youthfulness to this frock that its frivolity is taken as a matter of course, and the deep flaring cuffs that finish the sleeves prove so unexpected as to be amusing.

CAPES CONTINUE

Capas and capelets have been taken such hold upon popular taste that designers continue to offer new models in them. It is something of a task to avoid duplicating styles and to preserve a flavor of individuality in wraps as simply constructed as the cape. But the ingenuity of the makers keep them from being tiresomely alike. There is a better chance for variety in dolmans and in combinations of cape and dolman, and an occasional model that is a cap, pure and simple, makes a success merely by contrast with these.

A cape of this kind in a black and white checked wool fabric invites study as a practical summer wrap, as shown in the picture. For young women, and for misses its simplicity commends it. It is a simple and joyful model with plain black satin collar and lining of gray flannel. Cuffs made of the lighter velvet wrap are equally shorter than those of georgette or other heavy weaves; the cape in the picture, about three-quarter length, is a good example. The neckline wrap with dolman sleeves shown on the figure at left is
