CHAPTER VII.

A Rat in a Trap?

Eduardo Ramon Torre, lounging before one of the deep windows of the drawing room, amoked his cispareties and hummed gay suatches of song, evidently quite happy, seemingly unaware of the presence of Gaucho Mornless and a brother vanquero, who, on the other hand, kept their eyes always upon the young Spanlard and their hard, brown hands close to their high, Thrown hands close to their high. The door opened and Stanway came in. Torre did not turn, did not cease and stood looking at the American curiously.

"Torre," called Stanway bluntly.

"Torre," called Stanway blundly.
Torre turned, smilled, ended a last high note clearly, and only then bowed very deeply to the rancher.
"At your partice, Senor Stanway," he said lightly.
"Gancho," said Stanway, for the moment ignoring Torre. "I shall be with the senor for a little. If you and your companion will wait for me in the patio I'll call you when I want you."

"Si, senor," responded the vaquero promptly. And from the door, as by way of afterthought: "We have not searched him, senor. No doubt he is

The true cowbors went out. Then pleasantly, insolently, Torre admitted to Stanway that he had been responsible for Senor de la Guerra's disappearance, this is know where he was, and that the captain was his own agent.

sy, no you gain rrom such an admis-sion?"
"Two things, senor. In the first place I am meeting you upon a basis upon which we may be able to come to terms. It seems that you are really the out for me and the walle to his eyes was hard and cruel cough now, "I am taunting a man whom I do not like. That is a pleasure."
Stanway frowned, not understand-ing.

"Then, twenty-four hours after her refusal, her grandfather will be dead. Then I shall be the heir to the entire property. You will accuse me of having murdered him, and I shall deny. It will go to the courts. In the lead I shall be cleared. You see, seinor, times are fortunately turbulent along the border, and what has happened may so easily be laid at the door of the poor devite of insurrectors. You can create suspicion, you can make trouble. But then three is she will, properly drawn and witnessed, and they will seekered, who will not be there is something clear." "And that?" curiously, wondering him far force would go in showing him far force would dishier ther, and they will swear that Senor de la Guerra became very angry with his granddaughter upon the very day of his disappearance; that he quarreled openly with her; that he vowed he would dishier ther, and that he peat immediately for his lawyer to make it will be that Teresa, heedless of them; that he defed be la Guerra e and swore that she would marry syou!"

"The mapped the rancher. "It's perjury?" The smile merely deepened upon Torre's handsome face. "But let us, think not of the legal morality of it but of the effect upon a jury. Who, when this point is made, will seem the one who would be destrous of the disappearance of the old gentleman? "Who then will appear in the light of the abductor? I leave it to you, busy over a new cigarette, "It the point will not hold." Stanway's mouth hardened. He saw that it Torre had made one mistake—it Dempton were in resultiy what he appeared, a weak tool—yet the young Spaniard had planned pains—takingly desewhere.

"What will you say when you are man and inneruning the whole. Join confronted with Dempton's written and signed confession?"
"That will never be. I know that he has confessed to nothing." Shut, on the other hand, the danger of which you speak would be much his forefinger upon the table between them. "I shall have Dempton's confession within twenty-four hours!" Torre shook his hacd, smilling his inscrutable smile.
