"FOOLI FOOLI FOOLI"

Dave's duties were simple enough. He had to drive a wagon to a coalyard, where a very superfor young man, with a collar, would express surplise that he had been so long gone, and tell him to back in under chute number so and so. It appeared to be the sound of the s namber so-and-so. It appeared to be always a matter of great distress to this young man that Dave idid not know which chute to back under until he was told. Having backed into position is door was opened. There was sinction that the coal in the bit should then run into the wagon boar but, and the coal in the bit should then run into the wagon boar but, and was sinction that the coal in the bit should then run into the wagon boar but, and was a since the door the coal bad to be shoveled. Then Dave had to drive to lan andjess that was given him, shovel the coal down a chute located in the most linaces-sible position the premises afforded, shold return to the coalyard, where the young man with the collar would faccitusly inquire whether Mrs. Blank had invited him in to afternoon tea, or if he had been waiting for a change in the weather.

Illis work and supper were over by seveni colock each evening, and now was the opportunity for him to begin the schooling for which he had left the ranch. But he developed a sudden disinclination to make the start; he was tired in the strent; and he found it much more to his liking to the strent comment of the strent comment. I much more to his liking to the strent comment of the strent comment of the strent comment. I much more to his liking to the weeks went by and when his input with Metford was up he had neglected to find another position, so he continued where he was. He was then; gradually and unconsciously submerged in an inertia which, however much it might hat e-tis present. So the fall and winder drifted along: Dave had made few aquantiances and of a friends, if we except Conward, shound he frequently incl in the pool-rooms and for whom he had developed a wort of attachment.

One Saturdsy evening, an Dave was on his way to their adequationed resort, he fell in with Conward on the street. "Helio, old, man!" said Conward cheerity. "I was just looking for young the said of the said Conward cheerity." I was just looking for young the said conward when he had cereally a seal

And then Dave looked in her face. It was a pretty face, notwithstanding its grease paint; and it smiled right late his eyes. His heart thumped between his shoulders as thought it would drive all the air from his lungs. She amiled at him—for him! Now they were away again; there were grained at him—for him! Now they were away again; there were grained at him—for him and with the same of the stage. Then there was a sudden break away in the dance, and the girl disappeared behind a forest. Dave supposed she had gone to rest; dancing like that must be hard on the wind, when the same of the sum of the su

But there was a whir from the forest, and the girl reappeared, this time all in red, right before him. And then she looked at Conward and saw him amiling too. And then he felt a very distressing uncertainty, which brought the color slowly to his face. He resolved to say nothing, but watch. And his observations convinced him that the smiles had been for Conward, not for him. And then he lost interest in the pile; and the smiles had been for Conward, not the pile; and the smiles had been for Conward, not the pile; and of the matter of the pile; and the smiles had been for Conward. There-through the side exit—the stage door is that way. She promised to have her chum with her. They'll be waiting if we don't hurry. "Coward steered him to the stage entrance, where a little group was already congregated. In a moment the girl appeared, handsomely dressed in furs. With her was nother girl, also from the chorus, but Dave could not recall, her part. He was suddenly aware of being introduced. "This is my friend Belton." Conward managed to whisper: "Whist! Your stage name. Mine's Edward, Don't forget." End of the third ways, and into a dark hall. A door opened. Conward managed to whisper: "Whist! Your stage name. Mine's Edward, Don't forget." "Here's looking!" said one of the girls.
"Here's looking!" said one of the girls.
"Here's looking!" said one of the girls.
Dave healtated, but the other girl clinked her glass against his. "Here's looking at your," she said, and she appeared to lay special emphasis on the last two words. Certainly her eyes were on Dave's as she raised her glass to her lips. And under the spell of those eyes he raised his glass and drained! The others were filled and drained! Other glasses were filled and drained. The three were chattering away, but Dave was but vaguely conscious of their talk and could weare no connected meaning info it. His head was buzzing with a pleasant, dreamy sensation. A very grateful warmth surrounded him, and with it came a disposition to go to sleep. He probably would have gone to sleep had his eye hot fallen on a picture on the wall. It was a bitture of a ciri noint-
