Two remarkable photographs showing some of the 70 homeless families of Copenhagen, Denmark, selecting their cell-apartments in the old women's prison, considered unfit for use and replaced by a new prison. Seventy families were absolutely without a roof to cover them, so the authorities opened the old, deserted prison.

HIS CHOICE

By JESSIE DO GLAS.

(Copyright 1920, by McClure, Newhall, &amp; Co., Inc.)

"You don't think she's pretty?" Kitty asked scornfully. "Why, her eyes are blue!" she opened her own brown eyes to their widest and gave William Davey a glance through fringed lashes. "Really, a faded blue, I think!" And she paused—how, that girl paused!

"Why, I thought—" "That's all you know about it, then," she answered almost snappishly. "And Marcia's features aren't a bit regular."

"I went into the library to get a book I couldn't find and she showed me just where it was," he stammered. "I said almost to myself—"

"Of course, if Marcia wants to work it's all very well, but I think a girl's place is at home; attending a girl of our class," she said decisively.

Then she looked up at William Davey and said, "Aren't you started? I am." A dimple smiled deep in her curving cheek and his eye and he admitted to himself, "Kitty was the prettiest thing I ever saw."

He watched Kitty's hands as they flew about the preparation of soft white hands with pink oval lips. She lighted the lamp under the reading dish and rang for Sarah. When Sarah came in she went to the room bearing a tray that held cheese and butter and toast and tall glasses, William's eyes were again fascinated by the skill and rapidity of those soft hands, of Kitty's as they stirred the bubbling liquid in the chafing dish.

It was a delicious doubt and Kitty and William laughed and chattered, but underneath it all William was conscious of a discomfort that he could not place.

When he had said good night and the door had banged after him, Kitty came back into the sitting room and threw herself down angrily on the big couch.

"Fool!" she cried to the pillows. "He's a fool! Why doesn't he, propose? I wouldn't even think of taking him if his father didn't own the Davey mills—old sawdust!"

"It's some make William stop living the simple life. After he marries me he'll have to give up that room over a shop on Fairview street and stop being a workman in the mills." She blew out the candle, looked in the mirror and climbed the stairs undisturbed.

William Davey, talking home through the darkness, was thinking of Kitty—and thinking how. "Jove, but she was pretty," he said to himself, of course, and lots of boys. That about apt working, for instance, when her father really needed her help.

He thought of Kitty again suddenly, when he went into the library a few nights later, re-reading the book on merchants that he had been studying. He remembered as he handed the book across the counter to Marcia Haden that Kitty had said his eyes were faded blue.

For a moment he was quite forgetful of what he was doing until he saw Marcia's cheeks begin to deepen their rose. "Paint—my face?" he was mistaken there, Marcia didn't paint. Funny how girls could get such things wrong.

"Could you show me?" he stammered. "Where I'd find the second volume of this?"

He followed her into one of the long, dusky, book-lined passages while she pointed out the book sitting snugly on its shelf. She reached up to it and as she did William saw her profile, not regular, but with a certain piquancy, a certain something that drew his eyes back to hers.

"I say," he asked, "what time do you get through here?"

"At nine," she smiled; and William wondered why two such simple words should sound so charming. "Is there anything else I can do for you?"

"Yes, you can let me walk home with you," he said.

She did not answer "yes" or "no," but when at last she stood waiting for her, she smiled, warmly up at him. All the way home he caught glimpses of her face behind the lighted street lamp; and as he stood on her own doorstep, with the yellow light falling on him, he wondered why he had never noticed her before.

But it was Marcia herself who started him.

"I'm leaving here in a month," she said. "I've been offered a much better position in Rockport. She held out a bare hand to him as he took it with his big one, she said, "Oh, don't pester me, don't look at it!" and drew back the roughened little hand.

"You see my last aren't soft?" he said. "I take care of the stores," she said.

William suddenly saw another pair of hands, soft, white, with oval pink nails; for some reason a curious lump came into the way of his talking.

"Good night," he said at last.

Why was it that that small rough hand should come before him again and again on his way home? He felt a queer, expressive eyes and a mouth neither smile nor frown, but a little in its current. He let himself in, his own quaint chamber at last, before he struck and caught the spark.

"If I hadn't been for Kitty, I never would have known that the other existed! I wonder if I've got a chance!" he pondered.

While one eye on a street a girl with a shovelful of coal into a fire with a small, shrewd hand, he was looking to see tiny blue flames that leaped up to meet her.
