It's illegal to alter auto emission controls

By PATRICK KELLY

In the past few years, many motorists decided they could get better performance and gasoline mileage if they altered their car's emission-control system.

The word now is: Don't do it. Don't do it for several reasons.

First of all, modifying the emission-control system is illegal. All automobile service and repair shops—not just car dealerships—now are prohibited by federal law from knowingly tampering with a car's emission controls.

An independent repair shop could be subject to a civil penalty of up to $2,500and a car dealership of up to $10,000. The federal law doesn't prohibit car owners from tampering with emission controls, but many states do have such laws.

The federal Environmental Protection Agency and auto manufacturers urge against tampering because:

- It will not improve a car's gas mileage and performance, and may even make it worse.
- Tampering is a waste, nullifying controls that cost $200-$300.
- Tampering will add to air pollution.
- Tampering also could void the car'swarranty.

Motorists also should not substitute leaded gasoline in cars that require nonleaded gasoline. Leaded gasoline can clog and ruin the catalytic converter.

Emission control is part of the total design and function of the engine, including the carburetor, distributor, intake manifold and EGR (recirculating valve). If one of these is altered, it likely will affect the others, usually adversely. Fuel efficiency, therefore, can suffer.

The federal EPA considers tampering as removing, disconnecting, damaging or inany way rendering ineffective any emission-control device or element of design installed on a car or truck.

These items include the engine components mentioned above, plus the catalytic converter, air pump, vacuum lines and other peices of the power generation system.

Enlarging the gas filler to allow use of leaded gas in cars that require unleaded gasoline also is considered tampering, as is use of a noncertified carburetor.

For maximum operating efficiency and economy, motorists should maintain their cars according to the manufacturer's specifications.
