

Milliken sets new rules for tankers

New rules from Gov. William Milliken's office will govern the transportation of highly flammable liquids in double-bottom tanker trucks.

The restrictions are intended to implement the double-bottom control act, signed into law by Milliken last month, until permanent rules can be drawn up, subjected to public review and approved by the legislature.

In signing the bills, Milliken complained of the new law's failure to be specific about safety standards which double-bottoms are to meet by Nov. 1.

He directed Michigan State Police to "take whatever steps are necessary to require that 'retrofitting' equipment, such as that suggested by the University of Michigan Highway Safety Research Institute, is in place" at that time for all double-bottoms hauling flammable liquids in bulk with a flashpoint of 70 degrees Fahrenheit or less.

The U-M institute developed a coupler between the two trailers to further stabilize the tankers. Most fatal tanker crashes come about when the second trailer, or pup, tipped over.

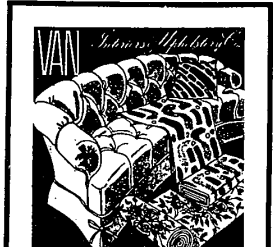

Other rules which state police will enforce include:

- In the counties of Wayne, Oakland and Macomb, double-bottoms hauling flammable liquids with a flashpoint at or below 70 degrees Fahrenheit (gasoline, acetone and ether) will be restricted to certain limited access highways between midnight and 6 a.m. Direct routes from the limited access highway to the supply depot are designated for travel (and listed at state police headquarters).
- Double-bottoms carrying flammable liquids with a flashpoint more than 70 degrees are not restricted.
