

Brodhead, residents rejoice

Mideast pact spawns hope at home

By SHIRLEE IDEN

Hope, guarded optimism and euphoria are some of the local reactions to the breakthrough for peace achieved Sunday at Camp David.

"Where were you Sunday night at 10:30 when they stopped the world to announce the agreements on the Mideast?" is the question of the day.

U.S. Rep. William Brodhead (D-Detroit) was at a dinner in Oak Park for the Magen David Adom (Israeli Red Cross) but he was thinking about the 11 p.m. news and the substantive action that had been reported to be going on at Camp David.

By Monday morning, he was back in Washington where the mood was euphoric, he said in a phone call to the Observer & Eccentric.

Brodhead made the call following a special briefing for a group of congressmen and others. Called for 12:30 p.m. Monday, the meeting was delayed 30 minutes while President Jimmy Carter spoke with Jordan's King Hussein.

"The president gave a very impressive presentation," Brodhead said. "What astounded me was that in the 15 minute briefing which was extremely detailed, he didn't use a single note."

Brodhead added that Carter told the group it took 23 drafts of the documents before an agreement was reached.

"I'M SO HAPPY and relieved that this problem which has hung over us for long long may now be moving toward a solution," he said. "We've come further in these 13 days at Camp David than in the past 30 years."

"But there are still some tough parts to be solved," Brodhead continued. "King Hussein told the president he will not commit himself to the agreements until he has seen the copies."

"It's been a difficult time here in Washington and now everybody's so excited," the congressman added. "It's a real breakthrough."

Nadia Alkateeb, a Farmington Hills resident, said she and her husband, Joe, watched every minute of the telecast from the White House.

"We wanted to hear only positive things," she said. "And I believe we did. We're very much affected because both our families are in Lebanon. Although they don't live in Gaza or the West Bank, I think the future of Lebanon is closely tied up in all this."

Although the later analyses she has heard were less positive, Mrs. Alkateeb is still optimistic.

"Maybe all this will make people say, if these two men, (Egypt's President) Sadat and (Israeli Prime Minister) Begin, can sit down and talk, there is hope," she said.

Mrs. Alkateeb was born in this country but has visited Lebanon four times, the latest in March. "It was a shock to see soldiers at every crossroad when we visited," she said.

"I pray this will bring peace. I want my children to be able to walk across the border to Israel and visit with Jewish children."

ALVIN KUSHNER, executive director of the Jewish Community Council, said there is "guarded optimism" in the Jewish community.

"We're elated that the first steps to peace have been taken and, hopefully, in three months, there will be a peace treaty," Kushner said. "We believe the Knesset (Israeli parliament) will vote to give up the settlements in the Sinai and on the West Bank. It's a call-culated risk in terms of security, but it's a risk for peace."

He said the framework agreement is a potential for the desires of the Palestinians. "We hope King Hussein will get involved," he said. "The most important problems for us will be how Israel is secured."

He said one area on which all Jews are united is that Jerusalem must never be divided again. "We don't want another Berlin Wall," Kushner said.

He added that one popular saying in Israel is, "a hawk is only a scared dove."

James Jardaack, of Southfield, who was born in Iraq but has lived here since his teen years, said he plays the agreements mean both sides are closer to peace.

"There's been bad feeling for 30 years and it is going to take time to erase all of that," he said, "but now it's like we're back to biblical times when all the religions lived together in peace."

"I think what's happened is a big deal and I really liked it when President Carter quoted a Psalm of David about peace and said we shall all be the children of peace."

MRS. GOLDIE ADLER of Southfield, widow of Rabbi Morris Adler, said that peace for the whole world can come out of peace for the Middle East.

"I hope that humanity, for a little while, can stop thinking of Israel as an autonomous state, and see it as the Holy Land," she said.

Mrs. Adler has visited the Middle East many times and lived in Israel for a year while the rabbi was on sabbatical. "My grandson is studying in Jerusalem right now," she added, "and I have my passport ready to go there for a visit."

Jules Doneson, who fought for Israeli independence in 1948, said he is enjoying the euphoria.

The Southfield travel agent, and Farmington resident, said, "The hardest part remains to be seen."

"After watching an interview with Begin and Barbara Walters, I concluded Israel is only committed to not building new settlements in the Sinai, but is free to build in the West Bank and I wonder about that," he said.

"I wouldn't like to see anyone split hairs or play games with language. I think Sadat is quite sincere and I have always wanted to see Egypt make a separate peace with Israel."

"The people of the Middle East can't be expected to continue to live in the way of the past 30 years."
