When the attendance figures for all of the college football games in the country during the past season are reported and tabulated it is almost certain that the University of Michigan Stadium has been the most popular battlefield for these gridiron rivalries.

In its six home games this year Michigan has averaged more than 104,000 people to sell out gatherings at Notre Dame and Ohio State. What's more, the Wolverines have played before sellout crowds at every home game for more than two seasons.

These figures are a far, far cry from what Fielding H. (Hurry-Up) Yost envisioned when he supervised the building of the Michigan Stadium back in the mid 1920s.

Thought to be wildly optimistic when he insisted on building a stadium with a seating capacity of 72,000, the followers of that day — and every reason to wonder what the "Old Man" would have to say if he returned and saw one of the modern football crowds at the stadium.

While the plan for 72,000 was thought to be almost too optimistic in the mid 1920s, the stadium has since been enlarged several times and there is talk of further expansion — although no official plans as yet, a feeling now that it may be enlarged again. This time it will not be a new ring around the top but a series of special boxes across the field from the press box.

When the stadium was built 50 years ago at a cost of $950,000, it had a seating capacity of 72,000 and everyone in thought that would be enough for all time. But, as demand for seats increased, temporary wooden bleachers were added to the rim of the stadium. In 1949, the school replaced these temporary stands with permanent steel ones, and the capacity rose to 94,491.

Seven years later, in 1956, the capacity was raised to 101,001 and to 101,701 in 1973. Although that is the official capacity, the popularity of the Michigan football program has meant one overflow crowd after another.

While the stadium has undergone many changes in the past half century, so has the entire football program.

Can you imagine Michigan opening the season now with a double header against Central Michigan and Western Michigan? Well, that's what it did in 1931.

What is even more surprising, in looking back, is that Coach Yost took every means of letting the public know that it was invited to attend any of the games. And the price was only $3 a seat.

Today, Yost would be in Seventh Heaven, if he knew that the program he started years and years ago was now the most popular in the country and ticket sale soon will be limited to season tickets only. And at a price of $10 each home game.

That's what is about to happen for the 1979 season. This year the demand for seats was so great that Don Canham, the athletic director, had to abandon "Band Day" on a football Saturday when the team was home. He couldn't afford to give up that many seats when the public was clamoring for them.

In 1979, the demand is expected to outdo any previous year — and for a good reason. Both Notre Dame and Ohio State will be on the home schedule and it is almost certain that the fans will be standing in the aisles and sitting on the rim for a new attendance record. That record now stands at 106,000.

"Old Man" Yost certainly would be smiling and chewing on his famous cigar if he could come back just to take a look on an autumn Saturday afternoon in Ann Arbor.
