

SPECIMEN TREES have been grouped to make an attractive landscape scene which is enhanced by the gently rolling terrain and a well-kept lawn.

NEEDLES of the tamarack, clustered in whorls along the branches, are shed every fall, but the tiny cones hang on for two seasons.

GINKGO leaves look like small oriental fans, and the leaves of redbud are nearly heart-shaped. Sycamore leaves are large and shaped somewhat like maple leaves. Mountain ash has compound leaves composed of many small leaflets that are shed as a unit.

THE WHITE BIRCH, which is widely distributed and grows to a large size in the Upper Peninsula, is a popular small ornamental tree in this area. It is also known as paper birch or canoe birch.

sunburst locust, tulip tree, and pin oak are among the shade trees the Camerons are growing, and among the smaller trees of special interest are red horse-chestnut, red mulberry, purple smoke tree, dawn cypress (Metasequoia) and Katsura tree (Cercidiphyllum).
These trees are many and varied, and in nature come from widely separated areas and from different habitats. They are but a few of the rich assortment of trees that can be grown in Southern Michigan, but can serve to suggest some interesting possibilities to homeowners who are seeking diversity in the landscaping around their homes.
