

Society pays for what it wants

Kathleen Mooney of Birmingham (left), last year's Volunteer of the Year, presents a bracelet to Mary Schlager, also of Birmingham, named this year's recipient of the honor bestowed by New Horizons.

New Horizons doles honors

Awards for the contractor, employer, client and volunteer of the year were recently presented by New Horizons, a Church Drive agency.

New Horizons provides mentally and physically impaired persons with vocational training and helps them find employment at its three locations in Pontiac, Madison Heights and Farmington Hills.

A Plymouth-based manufacturer's representative specializing in light industrial assembly and packaging, Edward S. Walton & Associates was named Contractor of the Year. Since mid-1976, the company has supplied steady and diversified sub-contracts to all three branches.

Mary Schlager of Birmingham was named Volunteer of the Year for her efforts in working directly with clients at two locations for the past five years. She succeeds Kathleen Mooney, also of Birmingham, in receiving the honor.

The Client of the Year award was presented to Arthur Harwell of Farmington Hills for showing consistent improvement since coming to New Horizons in 1969.

The 7-Up Bottling Co. of Detroit was honored as Employer of the Year for providing quality employment for handicapped persons. The company currently employs 21 former New Horizons clients.

A special award was given to the Marriott Corp. in Southfield and Troy for their cooperation and support in the development of sheltered community employment programs. Marriott has employed more than 20 trainees during the past two years in kitchen utility and food preparation.

Beverly Ames of Union Lake, Henry Kloubcar, Correlated Financial Planning Services of Southfield, Al Orenstein, attorney, Oak Park; and Sheldon Pringle, Charles Kay & Co., Farmington Hills, were named to the board of trustees.

J. Lyle Winslow of Birmingham and Albert Shuttle of Southfield were named honorary trustees.

Society generally gets what it wants through government power and the more awesome power of funding selected projects. While we debate the wisdom of this or that, we overlook important issues of who pays for social goals.

Commerce flourished with railroads because government funding subsidized land acquisition for roadbeds. Air travel mushroomed because society provided airports and employees such as air traffic controllers. The automobile is prominent in our life because government builds highways and gives services such as patrol cars.

We spend billions for a military system. We aid people who don't fit into the rewards of our economic system and call it a welfare program. We provide countless recreation and service facilities.

We get what we want. But somehow we make a mess of funding and suffer unnecessary tensions. We are not clear about the morality of paying for what society wants.

CHRYSLER'S financial troubles are reported as purely business issues, without including the way government acts. Comments tend to be moralistic rather than moral. Automotive experts doubt the wisdom of some government demands, such as air bags, but the real tensions come in the way costs are handled.

Research and development costs are about the same for each company or even each model. But the amount of that cost paid by a purchaser varies widely with the volume of each model produced. We reward the high volume producer and penalize the others.

If society wants a particular device on a car, society ought to provide the basic research and development. Then buyers could repay the government in a tax which is the same for each purchaser. The high and low volume models would be honestly competitive with each other.

The moral question is whether society should favor business as we now do by spreading basic costs over many cars. Do we want to continue driving smaller enterprises out of business, as we have done in so many areas such as farming, grocery stores, and all the investment companies being swallowed by conglomerates?

Does logic from ordinary experience carry over? I pay the same for my fishing license whether I go to a large lake or a small one. My ticket costs the same whether I am assigned to a jumbo jet or a conventional airplane. My auto license fee doesn't vary whether or not I ever go near a freeway.

WHEN WE PAY for crime, society invests in a cumbersome justice system as a remedial process rather than financing solutions to the causes of crime. More job training, better nutrition, and even more recreation, would make more sense than planning social programs with a punitive motive.
