Porsche will enter Indianapolis 500

Porsche, long known for its passenger and sports cars, will enter the Indianapolis 500 this year. Its entry is powered by a turbo-charged version of a production powerplant. The engine is similar to the one that has powered the winning car at Le Mans for three of the past four years. The chassis is being developed by Porsche and Interscope, a California-based racing team. The 33 alcohol-powered cars that will make up the field for the 500 are expected to reach speeds of more than 190 mph. The Indy 500 is considered to be the single biggest sports event in the world, with meaty $1.3 million in prize money and an estimated single-day attendance of more than 375,000 people.

The six-cylinder Indy Porsche engine has four valves per cylinder — operated by four gear-driven camshafts — and a hybred cooling system. The crankcase and cylinders are air-cooled, and the cyl-inder heads are water-cooled. This gives the engine greater power with better cooling and a lighter greater power with better counts and a secondary weight.

The turbo-charged flat-six powering the race car is derived from the same on-the-road engine that powers Porsche's 911 SC and 930 Turbo.

Three times in the last four years, different versions of the turbo-charged, flat-six Porsche engines have won the Le Mans 24-hour endurance race in France. Twice, the winning cars were open-bodied sports racing ears, but in 1979, the winning Porsche 935 was a car based on the production 911 coupe. In the Indy configuration, the Porsche six will compute with the most successful current indy enginess. The Cosworth and Foyt V8s and the Offen-bauser Four.

gines: The Cosworth and Poyt Vos and the Utter-hauser Four.

USAC regulations specify that each car can burn on more than 1.8 gallons of alcohol per mile. Since each entry in the 500-mile race is limited to 277.4 gallons, engine efficiency can not take second place to performance.
