New police tools: 3 file boxes and a book

On a gunmetal gray filing cabinet in the Livonia detective bureau, right next to the office coffee pot, sit three small file boxes and a book.

small file boxes and a book.

In a disarmingly modest way, they represent the beginning of what subtraban police departments have always lacked — a central information source.

In three months, the boxes have yielded more than 20 arrests for upwards of 30 arred robberies in Livonia, Garden City, Redford Township, Farmington, Farmington Hills and Dearborn Reights, said Detective Sgt. Fred Benson.

"I'm acting as a starting point. When the investigators have no place to go, no leads, they call me and say 'Freddy, what have you got?' "
What Benson has in the three boxes are the wiles and ways of robbers, gun-men and parolees in half a dozen out-men and arroles in hall a work and a broken such as a bro ments between people known to each other. On the surface, such cases don't seem to have much in common with robberies. But Benson has a reason for robberies. But Benson has a reason for dropping them in his new robbery file.

"Here's what I'm after — the people out there with access to weapons who will use those weapons. Because the theory is — if the opportunity is there, these are potential stick-up men."

Also fed into the file are arrests for

THIS PROCEDURE may seem rou-tine, but it isn't, Suburban departments in western Wayne County haven't had a formal system for communicating with each other on a regular, planned basis. As a result, police in one city may be unaware that the motorist they just stopped for a burned-out tailight matches the description of an armed robber in some other town.

matches the description of an armorrobber in some other town.

Robbers often develop patterns which make it easy for police to connect one armed robbery with some other robbery — once a system has been established so they can find out been established so they can find out about the other robbery. "Some people just rob pizza places," said Benson. "Some people just rob gas stations. Criminals are like everybody else — they stick with what they've been a success at. They're creatures of habit."

In addition to helping catch criminals, the file boxes have also helped Benson. In recent weeks, the state of Benson. In recent weeks, they have made him look like a very smart detective.

Because of the file, for example,
Benson was able to draw a connection between a man arrested for an armed robbery in Farmington last Tuesday, and a man sought for another robbery by Livonia police.

Becam interrogated the suspect who

Benson interrogated the suspect, who admitted the Livonia robbery.

Benson figures the suspect will never face charges on the Livonia robbery, mainly because he's already charged in Farmington, Westland and Dearborn

But the file on the Livonia robbery is 35 percent to be a respectable clearance rate, but Benson estimates his rate lately has approached 80 percent. Of 30 recent Livonia robberies, he figures only about a half-dozen remain uncleared.

THIS MAKES BENSON look good, but he emphasizes "This isn't just a one-way street. Everybody benefits from it."

For example, Benson helped Garden City police in their investigation of an October stick-up of a savings and loan association. The Garden City investiga-

Benson got started in robberies over Benson got started in robbertes over lunch. Ten days into an investigation, Benson found out his lunch partner, an-other Livonia detective, had investigat-ed a robbery with the same earmarks only a few months before. "I could have started where he left off," Benson decided.

off," Benson decided.
"I went down to the Detroit Police Department and I worked down there for one week with their robbery detail.
That was an experience," he recalled.
"You think there's crime out here?
One week in Detroit is a year in the suburbs."

BACK IN LIVONIA, Benson discovered "the lack of communication be-tween the area police departments in the investigation of the armed robberies.

"It seemed like each department was acting individually. Whether they could help somebody else, it wasn't important to them."

That led to the three file boxes and
